These inducements, which were presented for fostering the cod fisheries, no longer exist; and if they were the only arguments in support of the bounty now conferred on them, that bounty should be repealed. But, sir, I deny that these were the inducements for the enactment of these laws. They were arguments that were urged in favor of them; but the true reason of each of these laws was the salt duty. The salt duty was the source of all the allowances, whether called drawbacks or bounties, which have been bestowed by any of these laws upon the cod fisheries; and that I think I shall be able to show to the satisfaction of the Senate.

The reason of the law, I have said, was the salt duty. The law was predicated upon the idea that duties should be levied upon the consumption, and not upon the production, of the country; upon the imports, and not upon the exports. It was said, with a good deal of plausibility, that a man who exports an article which he has imported, and on which he has paid the import duty, should have that duty refunded; because it would be exchanged for some foreign article which would be brought into the country, and would again pay duty; and if you did not refund him the duty on the exported article, it would be equivalent to taxing him with double duty. In each of these acts, I maintain that it was the purpose of Congress to give a drawback, and not a bounty.

The difference between a drawback and bounty is well understood by the Senate, but may not be understood by the country; and I shall define what I understand to be that difference, in order that the people may appreciate properly the wrong done them by the present bounties bestowed on the cod fisheries. Drawback is a mere return of the duty paid by an importer of an article, upon his exportation of that article. It is refunding him his own money. It is, as said by Mr. Madison, in debate, in 1792, merely paying a debt—a debt due from the Government to the exporter of an article for moneys advanced by him to the Government upon importing that article. Bounty, on the other hand, is a gratuity, a premium bestowed upon the producers, the exporters, or the importers of certain articles, or upon those who engage ships in certain trades. Drawback is founded upon a valuable consideration—bounty upon mere governmental favor.

Having explained this distinction, I repeat that the purpose of all these laws was to give drawback and not bounty, that the fishermen themselves did not ask bounty, but drawback, that they did not sue for favor, but demanded justice. They said, give us what you give the merchant on the exportation of an article imported by him; return us our money—that is all we ask. Drawback, and not bounty, was all that was advocated by the representatives of fishermen in either House of Congress. They repudiated the charge of seeking bounty; they denied it, and protested that they only asked drawback and no bounty. Drawback and not bounty was all Congress intended to give.

A brief abstract of the several acts on the subject of fishing allowances will show that such was the intention of Congress as expressed in the acts themselves. I shall not weary the patience of the Senate by going over those acts, but will present a brief summary of such phrases in each of the acts as will establish the position I assume. In the first tariff act passed by the First Congress of the United States, on the 4th of July, 1789, a duty of six cents per bushel was laid on imported salt. The fourth section of the same act granted five cents for every quintal of dried, and every barrel of pickled fish, or of salted provisions, exported to foreign countries, and declared that this allowance was made, to use the language of the act, "in lieu of drawback of the duties on the importation of the salt employed and expended therein." Thus it appears that the duty exceeded the allowance in lieu of drawback by one cent per bushel of salt; and the fishermen afterwards complained that they did not really get an equivalent for the drawback; that the Government was still their debtor for something more than they had received. The reason of this assertion was that they said it required a bushel of salt for each quintal of dried or every barrel of pickled fish; and that, as they had paid six cents a bushel on importing the salt as duty, and received but five cents per quintal of dried, or barrel of pickled fish in return, they did not receive the full amount of their drawback.

The act of August 4, 1790, made stringent provisions, requiring full proof that the fish or provisions had been exported, and had been cured with foreign salt that had paid duty, before the drawback was paid. The act of August 10, 1790, doubled the duty on salt, raising it from six to twelve cents; and doubled the allowance on the fish or provisions exported, raising it to ten cents per quintal and ten cents per barrel; and declared, to quote the language of the act, that this was done "in lieu of a drawback of the duty on the salt expended thereupon."

Up to this period of time there can be no dispute—there is no ground for disputing the assertion, that drawback and not bounty was all that was granted by Congress; but then the system was changed on the petition of the fishermen themselves. By the act of February 18, 1792, the allowance was shifted from the shipper, or exporter of the fish to the owner of the fishing vessel, and from the exported fish to the tonnage of the vessel. This was done, at the instance of the fishermen themselves; and I will read a brief extract from one of their memorials in order to show what they expected to get, and what they asked. They said "that the bounty granted to the fishery by Congress"—they called it bounty, and I am amazed to find the term bounty is frequently used in the law, although according to the strict import of the term; inappropriately—"as a compensation for the duty on salt, will not operate to that effect so effectually as if paid direct into the hands of the owners of the vessels, instead of the shippers of the fish."

In pursuance of this and other memorials Congress shifted the allowance from the shipper of the fish to the owner of the fishing vessel, allowing so much per ton for each ton of the vessel employed in the cod fishery. It did not give, or propose to give, however, anything more than the drawback.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When was that?

Mr. CLAY. On the 18th of February, 1792. The amount of the allowance on the tonnage was regulated by the quantity of salt consumed in curing the fish. It was said that each quintal of fish required a bushel of salt, and it was estimated that the average quantity of fish taken to each ton would be twelve, and therefore the duty multiplied by twelve gave the allowance per ton to each vessel employed in the cod fishery. Now, it will be remarked, and may be urged in argument on the other side of this question, that this tonnage allowance varied with the size of the vessel, and hence it may be maintained that really more was given in the way of tonnage allowance than had been given in the way of drawback on the exported fish. But, in reply to that assertion, it will be found that the tonnage allowance, although it may have exceeded somewhat the drawback on the larger class of vessels, fell below it on the smaller vessels more than it exceeded it on the larger, and thus in the aggregate, as alleged by the advocates of this law, the Government probably paid out less in the way of tonnage allowance than it did in the way of drawback. Besides, there was a maximum aggregate allowance fixed by law, which could not be exceeded, although falling short of the duty paid by the vessel on the salt it consumed.

The advocates of the act of 1792 maintained that the Government, as well as the fishermen, would save money by the change proposed. I will read a brief extract from the speech of every advocate of the fishing bounty in 1792, made in Congress, in order to show what they intended, or professed to intend, in the enactment of the law. Mr. Goodhue, of Massachusetts, on the 3d of February, 1792, speaking of the objections to the existing mode of paying the allowance in lieu of drawback to the shipper or exporter of the fish, said:

"The object of the present bill is only to repay the same money into the hands of those persons who are immediately concerned in catching the fish; and there can no reasonable objection be made to such a transfer of the drawback, as Government will not lose a single dollar by the change. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] talks of the unconstitutionality of granting bounties; but no bounty is required. We only ask, in another mode, the usual drawback for the salt used on the fish. If we can make it appear that the bill does not contemplate any greater sums to be drawn from the Treasury than are already allowed, it is to be hoped that no further opposition will be made to the measure; and that this is really the case, can be proved by documents from the Treasury office."

And then he read a statement and calculation, to prove his assertion; and to show that the United States would probably save a thousand dollars per annum by making the proposed change. Mr. Ames, of Massachusetts, said on the same day:

"Though the whole is intended for the benefit of the fishery, about one fourth of what is paid is not so applied; there is a heavy loss both to Government and the fishery. Even what is paid on the export is nearly lost money; the bounty is not paid till the exportation, nor then, till six months have elapsed; whereas, the duty on salt is paid before the fish is taken—it is paid to the exporter, not to the fishermen. The bounty is so indirect that the poor fisherman loses sight of it. It is paid to such persons, in such places, and at such periods, as to disappoint its good effects; passing through so many hands, and paying so many profits to each, it is almost absorbed."

"Yet, instead of asking bounties, or a remission of duties on the article consumed, we ask nothing but to give us our money back, which you received under an engagement to pay it back, in case the article should be exported."

"The drawback falls near nine thousand dollars short of the salt duty received by the Government."

"We rely on the evidence before you, that the public will not sustain the charge of a dollar."

Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, said on the same day:

"It is now proposed to make a further commutation; gentlemen call this a bounty on occupation; but is there any proposition made for paying to the fishermen, or other persons concerned in the fishery, any sums which we have not previously received from them? If this were the case, it would indeed be a bounty, but if we beforehand receive from them as much as the allowance amounts to, there is no bounty granted at all."

"The only question now is, whether this be a direct bounty, or simply a commutation of the allowance already granted by Congress."

Mr. Livermore, of New Hampshire, said on the 6th of February, 1792:

"If gentlemen are disputing only because the word 'bounty' is in the bill, they may be perfectly relieved from their uneasiness on that score; for the bill expressly says 'that the bounty now allowed upon the exportation of dried fish, of the fisheries of the United States shall cease, and in lieu thereof, a different kind of encouragement to be given. Here is no reason to dispute about a word. If gentlemen are disposed to consent to the principle of the bill, that the drawback of the duties on salt shall be commuted for a certain sum, to encourage the fishermen, they will vote in favor of the bill; if not, they will vote against it. But it is impossible for me to conceive why any gentleman under heaven should be against it."

"It does not lay a farthing of bounty or duty on any other persons than those who are immediately concerned in it. It will serve them, and will not injure anybody."

Mr. Lawrence, of New York, said:

"From examining the section, he conceived it contemplated no more than what the merchant is entitled to under the existing laws. The merchant is now entitled to the drawback, but it is found by experience that the effect has not been to produce that encouragement to the fishermen it was expected; and he presumed the way was perfectly clear to give a new direction to the drawback; and this is all that is aimed at in the bill."

Mr. Madison, of Virginia, participated in the debate; and I wish to call particular attention to his remarks, because, in the recent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, he is spoken of as one of the fathers of this system; and it is due to him to vindicate him from the reproach of being the advocate of bounties. On the other hand, he combatted, in an elaborate and able argument, the doctrine of the "general welfare," then first put forth by General Hamilton; and he supported the bill expressly on the ground that it was a mere commutation of drawback, but no bounty. Mr. Madison said:

"I think, however, that the term bounty is in every point of view improper, as it is here applied, not only because it may be offensive to some, and, in the opinion of others, carries a dangerous implication, but also because it does not express the true intention of the bill, as avowed and advocated by its patrons themselves. For if, in the allowance, nothing more is proposed than a mere reimbursement of the sum advanced, it is only paying a debt; and when we pay a debt we ought not to claim the merit of granting a bounty."

Mr. Bourne, of Massachusetts, said:

"The object of the first section in this bill is intended for the relief of the fishermen and their owners. They complain that the law now in force was meant for their benefit, by granting a drawback on the fish exported; this they find by experience is not the case, for they say that neither the fishermen who catch the fish, nor the importer of the salt, receive the drawback; and I rather suppose, sir, it is the case."

Thus I have quoted from every speech in favor of this tonnage allowance in 1792, all of which corroborate my assertion that the purpose avowed by the advocates of this system was to secure a drawback and not bounty; that they all repelled the charge of seeking bounty, and protested that they demanded justice, but sued for no favor. In compliance with this understanding this act was passed, and every subsequent act which was passed upon the subject expresses in itself the same purpose. Thus the act of May, 1792, increased the duty by substituting for the measured bushel of eighty-four pounds the weighed bushel of fifty-six pounds, and added twenty per cent. to the fishing allowance. The act of July, 1797, increased the salt duty to twenty cents a bushel, and added thirty-three and a third per cent. to the allowance. The act of April, 1800, continued this allowance for ten years, which would have expired in 1800 by the limitation of the last act of 1797, but continued it on this express condition:

"That said allowances shall not be understood to be continued for a longer time than the correspondent duties respectively, for which such allowances were granted, shall be payable."

The act of May, 1807, repealed the duty and the allowances. At the time that act was passed, scarce a word was said in defense of the fisheries; all the resistance was against the repeal of the duty, because the advocates of the fisheries seemed to take it for granted that if the duty were repealed the allowance would be repealed, as a matter of course. They all regarded it, as it really was, but an incident of the salt duty, deriving its existence from the salt duty, and necessarily dying with the salt duty. The act of July, 1813, revived the duty of twenty cents a bushel on salt, and gave a drawback of twenty cents on pickled fish, and a proportionate bounty on tonnage. The act of March, 1819, increased the bounty. A change of the tonnage allowance always followed every change in the salt duty. It originated with the salt duty, rose with the salt duty, perished with the salt duty, was revived with the salt duty, was increased with the salt duty, and has been continued with the salt duty; but has not been reduced with the duty.

Thus, sir, upon the face of the acts themselves, I think it is perfectly manifest that the purpose of Congress was to grant a drawback, but no bounty. In respect to these tonnage allowances, I find that in 1816, when a resolution was offered for their repeal, Mr. Reed maintained that the tonnage allowance was not equal to the drawback. He stated that though it might exceed it on some vessels, in the aggregate it fell short of the drawback. Such was perhaps the fact.

The fishermen themselves always understood and construed the law as giving drawback and not bounty. After the repeal of the salt duty and the allowances in 1807, many of them came to Congress with memorials praying to be paid the allowance, on the ground that they had purchased salt, and paid duty on it before the repeal of the law; and in some instances the vessel had been cast away or the salt landed in a foreign country from their vessels wrecked. In each and every instance, it will be found that they treated the allowance as a mere drawback or commutation of the drawback of the salt duty. For example, here is the memorial of several persons residing in Portsmouth, in which they say:

"The salt employed by said vessels in said voyages had paid the highest duty on that article, for they sailed with all their salt on board, nearly two months before the duty was reduced at all. As the allowance was expressly granted in consideration of the duty, the full allowance is due, as the full duty had been paid. Justice would say that, having paid the duty without any diminution, they ought to receive the allowance without any diminution."

Here is the petition of others, of the town of Killingworth, Connecticut, in which they say:

"Your petitioners, however, believe that the circumstances herein related bring them within the spirit of the law allowing a bounty; that the salt sent in said vessel has, in fact, been exported. And your petitioners cannot persuade themselves that it was the intention of Congress to allow the bounty only to the fortunate. The revenue is no more injured in this case than in other cases where a bounty is received; and the fishermen sent out in the vessel have been employed in the fishery for the whole period required by law."

I might multiply these illustrations of the construction of the fishermen themselves, but will rest with these. All of them show, however, that they regarded this as an allowance in lieu of drawback, as nothing more than drawback, and no bounty.

Such has been the construction of the Treasury Department from the time of Mr. Hamilton down to that of Mr. Woodbury; for in all their annual reports you will find that they exhibit the proceeds of the salt duty in this manner: first, they show the aggregate number of bushels imported, then the aggregate number exported, then the allowances to the fishing vessels; then they convert those allowances into bushels of salt at the existing rate of duty, and subtract them from the gross number of bushels imported, and then give the result as the net amount of salt-paying duty.

It appears, then, by the language of the acts themselves, by the arguments of the advocates of those acts, by the memorials of the fishermen praying for those acts, by the construction of those acts by the fishermen, and by the construction of the Treasury Department, that Congress gave, or intended to give, and the fishermen asked, or professed to ask, nothing more than drawback, and no bounty.

But, sir, what is the fact at this time? Instead of merely receiving drawback, they now receive a large amount of bounty. This has resulted from the reduction of the salt duty, without any corresponding reduction of the tonnage allowance. Up to 1830, to which time the salt duty was twenty cents on the weighed bushel of fifty-six pounds, which was equal to about thirty cents on the measured bushel of eighty pounds—up to 1830, if they received anything more than drawback, it was, probably, an inconsiderable amount; but, in that year, the salt duty was reduced from twenty to fifteen cents per bushel; in 1832, to ten cents; and, by the compromise act of 1833, a prospective scale of reduction was made, under which it sank to six ninety-eight one-hundredths in 1840; and at this day it amounts to only about two cents per bushel. The difference between the drawback which would be due, and the bounty which is received, may be estimated by multiplying the number of bushels of salt, allowing twelve to the ton by the duty, and subtracting it from the amount paid out. I have done that, and have prepared a table exhibiting the tonnage of the vessels engaged in the cod fisheries, the allowance paid them, the sums due as drawback, and the excess of bounty over drawback for the period of ten years past. I shall not trouble the Senate to hear it all; but will append it to my remarks.* [See note at the foot of next column.] I will call the attention of the Senate to four periods of time, equidistant, to show what has been the operation and effect of these laws within the last ten years. In 1848, the tonnage was eighty-two thousand six hundred and fifty-two tons; the allowance paid to the fishing vessels, $243,434; the sums due as drawback at the rate of duty paid at that time, $22,811; the excess of bounty over drawback, $220,622. In 1851 the allowance paid was $328,267; the sum due as drawback at the rate of duty then existing, $25,193; and the excess of bounty over drawback, $303,074. In 1854, the tonnage was one hundred and two thousand one hundred and ninety-four; the allowance, $374,286; the sum due as drawback, $31,261; and the excess of bounty over drawback, $343,000. In 1857 the tonnage reported was one hundred and four thousand five hundred and seventy-three; the allowance paid, $601,453; the sum due as drawback at the existing rate of duties, $29,233; and the excess of bounty above drawback, $572,219. The average tonnage per year for ten years past was ninety-three thousand seven hundred and eighty-two; the average allowance to the fisheries, $323,046; the average sums due as drawback, $26,612; the average annual excess of bounty over drawback, $292,433; and the aggregate excess of bounty over drawback nearly $3,000,000—$2,964,336. Thus it appears that the effect of these laws has been widely different from what was intended by Congress in passing them, and what was supposed or expected by the fishermen and their advocates. Thus it appears that the reason of the law has ceased.

Mr. TOOMBS. What part of the whole salt duty did they absorb?

Mr. CLAY. At this day, and during the last ten years, instead of realizing simply a drawback of the duty on the salt consumed by them in the fisheries, they have realized all the salt duty, and not only all the salt duty, but for several years more than the salt duty. This, however, is not a full exhibit of the tax of this system on the people of the United States, because I have estimated the drawbacks due the fisheries upon the hypothesis that they imported all their salt, whereas the manufacturers of salt in Massachusetts tell us that they supply the larger part of what is used in the fisheries. It is predicated on the further hypothesis that they consume twelve bushels of salt to the ton, or in other words, that they catch twelve quintals of fish to the ton; whereas Mr. Zeno Scudder, formerly a Representative in the other House from the Barnstable district, the largest fishing district in New England, which has received more than two million dollars in the shape of allowance and bounty, said in August, 1852, in the other branch of Congress, that they averaged but nine quintals to the ton, instead of twelve. If he was correct, we should add twenty-five per cent. to the excess of bounty as it has been estimated by me.

Nor, sir, does that exhibit fully the tax upon the Government of the United States in support of these fisheries. You must take into consideration the cost of collecting and disbursing this bounty—estimated by all political economists at not less than two per cent.—and ranging from two to thirty; but, putting it down to the lowest amount on the $600,000 paid last year, it is no inconsiderable sum. Nor does this exhibit all the tax of this system; for you must remember that there have been revenue boats employed for a series of years, partly in order to watch these fishermen and prevent their committing frauds upon the Treasury, and their violation of the laws regulating the cod-fisheries; and that there have been four revenue cutters employed partly for the same purpose, at an annual expense of about eleven thousand dollars each, stationed upon the coast employed at the instance of the collectors in the mouth of the Rio Grande inclusive, we have but nine employed. My attention was directed to this, and on inquiring at the Treasury Department the reason, I learned that some of these supernumerary cutters and revenue boats had been employed at the instance of the collectors in the fishing districts in New England to watch the fishermen and prevent their violations of the law. I have the evidence at hand to exhibit when this charge is controverted. Thus we pay the fishermen bounty for catching cod, and pay officers and men of revenue cutters and boats to see that they do their work honestly, and do not defraud the Government.

Now, Mr. President, why shall not these laws be repealed? I show that the inducements to the laws—if revenue, or commerce, or seamen were the inducements—no longer exist. I show that the reason of the law has ceased to exist; I show that the effect of the law is what was never intended or expected or desired by the fishermen. I show that they realize a bounty, and it behooves their advocate to show the authority of Congress to grant it. I deny that we have any such power under the Constitution; I challenge the citation of that clause of the Constitution which warrants bounties, or the citation of any express grant of power to carry out which these bounties are indispensably necessary. On the contrary, I maintain that this power is plainly forbidden in several clauses of the Constitution, as well as by the whole spirit of that instrument and the theory of our Government. The Constitution declares that "direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers;" that "no capitation or direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census;" and that "all duties, imports, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

The clear intent of all these clauses was to prevent Congress from imposing greater burdens, or conferring greater benefits, upon some States or some classes of citizens than upon others, and to secure justice, equity, and equality in the collection and the disbursement of the revenue of the Government. Now, sir, suppose a bill for direct taxation were pending before this body, and a motion were made to exempt the citizens of Maine and Massachusetts from its operation, or from the imposition of a tax upon any single article, say their salt, proposed to be collected in the other States of the Union: Senators of the other twenty-nine States would revolt at the proposition; and even the Senators of those two States would concede that it was grossly unjust, if not unconstitutional. Suppose a tariff bill were now pending, and it were proposed to permit the people of Maine and Massachusetts to import their goods free of duty, or merely to import their salt free of duty, while exacting duty at the other ports of the United States. This, too, all would concede, would be unequal, unjust, and unconstitutional.

Wherein lies the difference in principle or effect between the two cases supposed, and that which exists. True, the people of Maine and Massachusetts pay a duty on their salt, like other people, but then you refund them that duty, not as drawback, but as bounty; not upon exported fish, cured with foreign salt, but upon all the fish that they catch, whether consumed at home or exported to foreign countries. Yea, you not only pay them all the duty received from them, but you give them all the duty received from everybody else. You refund them their $26,000 paid as duty on salt, and superadd $292,000 collected off other people as duty upon salt. You give them twelve hundred per cent. more than they pay in. For every dollar which they put in the Treasury as a duty upon salt, you return them twelve and a half dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to understand the argument of the Senator. Will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do I understand him to press his argument in reference to the unconstitutionality of the bounty, or whatever it may be, as founded on the unequal operation of it?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir; partly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, I can only say that I do not understand that argument as a legal one; that because an act operates unequally, ergo it is unequal in view of the Constitution.

Mr. CLAY. It is either intended to operate unequally, or it necessarily does operate unequally.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We must judge by its terms.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, to proceed with what I was saying, I ask wherein lies the difference between exempting one State from the payment of taxes or duties, to the Government, and refunding it all its duties or taxes? Wherein lies the difference between exempting the people of Maine and Massachusetts from the payment of any salt duty, and refunding them all that they pay? Why, sir, in principle it is the same thing. Can you say that taxes are apportioned among the several States according to numbers, or that all duties, imposts, and excises are uniform throughout the United States, if you collect duties or collect taxes from every State, and then give the taxes thus collected to one or two States? Is this imposing equal burdens and conferring equal benefits on the several States and the people who compose the States, as clearly intended by those clauses of the Constitution which I have read? It would be far better for the interests of other taxpayers, and the interest of the other twenty-nine States of this Union, if the people of Maine and Massachusetts were permitted to import their salt free of duty; because then, instead of paying them $323,000 a year, we should remit them but $36,000; we should pay them but a dollar where we now pay them twelve and a half.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question in reference to the legal point?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. According to his argument, if the people of one State did not use as much of a particular imported article which paid a duty as the people of another State proportionately, the law would be unconstitutional because it operated unequally!

Mr. CLAY. Not at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly that would follow from the argument. It is a necessary consequence of the argument.

Mr. CLAY. I think not. I further maintain that this is unconstitutional because it is unjust. Nothing is proper or tolerable in legislation which is unjust. "To establish justice" the Constitution was framed and the Union was formed. Justice is the spirit of the Constitution and the bond of the Union, without which the Constitution is valueless and the Union a curse. Justice is equality, is conferring equal bounties and imposing equal burdens upon all the States, and all classes of citizens within the States.

Now, sir, I ask what can be more unjust than this bounty paid to the cod fisheries? Is it just to exact of the mackerel, and herring, and other fishermen, a payment of the duty upon their salt, and to exempt the cod fishermen from the payment of the same duty? Is this uniform taxation? Wherein, I repeat, lies the difference between exempting cod fishermen from the duty and returning them the duty? Is it just to require of the beef and pork packers of the West, and of the farmers of the entire Union, the payment of a duty on the salt which they consume, and to relieve the fishermen of the same burden in support of the Government? Is it just, or rather can anything be more unjust than not only to relieve the cod fishermen from this burden imposed upon other citizens of the United States, but to give them the proceeds of that burden as a bounty? I should like to know what excuse the representatives of the other twenty-nine States of this Union can render to their constituents for sustaining a system which taxes a common necessary of life, the salt which they use, in order to raise bounties for a privileged class of two or three thousand, or at most fifteen thousand persons?

Since the doctrine of protection has been exploded, and is without a party in the country, or even an advocate in Congress, upon what principle can this bounty be maintained or defended? Is it the extremest, greatest, and worst kind of protection; exceeding protecting duties, or prohibiting duties, or exemption from paying duties, or remission of duties. It is taking money derived from taxing the many, and giving it to the favored few. Here are twelve or fourteen thousand men, if the fishermen get the bounty, or less than three thousand if the owners get it, receiving $300,000 annually from the Treasury as a pure gratuity; not for what they have done, or are doing, or will do, for the Treasury, or the Government, or the people of the United States; but for what they are doing for themselves; for pursuing their own business, for working for themselves, for catching cod fish! The consideration of this bounty is the catching and selling, or cooking and eating, of cod fish; the filling of their own purses, or stomachs! For this they are made pensioners of the Government—the only civil, the only honorary pensioners; for this they are preferred above all other fishermen, all other men of all other occupations; for this they are made peculiar, extraordinary, and exclusive favorites; for this they are honored and advanced above all other classes of pensioners. All other pensions rest upon some past and valuable consideration—upon public services, or losses sustained, or sufferings endured for the Government in the Army or Navy; but for this no such support can be found. The cod fishermen are not in the public service; they have not been public servants; they have not lost their limbs or their health, or suffered any injury, or incurred any peril in the public service, at the call of their country. They are pensioners, not by merit, but by mere favor!

No; it is not what they are or have been, or do or have done, or must or will do, for their country, that they are fostered and fed by Government; it is for what they may do in the future; it is upon the possibility of future service, that they are thus made stipendiaries of Government. We may need these men to man our ships, say their advocates; therefore, we should cultivate their patriotism, and encourage their piscatory pastimes or pursuits, by an annual conciliatory bribe of $300,000. They are the nurslings of the sea; the nascent Neptunes whose hands may direct our navies, defend our commerce, and decide the destiny of our country in war! If war comes, where can you find seamen, save in the cod fisheries? No where! Not among the four thousand mackerel, nor the twenty thousand whale fishermen, nor the one hundred and thirty thousand merchant sailors, nor the seven thousand navy seamen; not among these one hundred and sixty-one thousand men is there skill, courage, and patriotism enough to fight our naval battles. No, you must look to the cod fishermen to dare the dangers of the deep, and defy the terrors of gunpowder, and grapple with our foes!

Surely, if the destinies of our common country center in the cod fisheries, then we may exclaim with Fisher Ames, "the catching of cod is a very momentous concern."

Let us examine this bold and startling proposition, and see how far it can be sustained by facts or by arguments. No class of men can claim a monopoly of patriotism or of courage; and the cod fishermen cannot prove their title to a larger share of these virtues than other fishermen or sailors. Neither can any satisfactory or sufficient reason be assigned why they are or should become better seamen.

Why should they excel the mackerel fishermen in skill, courage, or patriotism? They are of the same race, derived from the same origin, speak the same language, worship the same God, live under the same Government, and pursue similar vocations. Mr. Scudder says the mackerel fishing is pursued in the same or similar vessels, in the same waters, at the same season of the year, and often by the same men, and is fraught with equal toil and danger. Wherein lies the difference of merit or value to the country between the catchers of mackerel and the catchers of cod? Mr. Scudder said there was none, and that they were equally entitled to Government favor. Certainly there can be no difference, unless it be imparted by the food. If the opinion of some philosophers or poets be true, that men partake of the nature of the animal on which they feed, perhaps there may be greater virtue in catching cod than mackerel or herring.

Why should they be better seamen than whale fishermen? A cod-fish voyage is of four months; a whaling voyage of two to four years. Are four months' tuition in cod fishing worth more than four years' whaling? A cod-fish excursion is of a few hundred miles; a whaling cruise of twenty thousand miles. Is more learned in a short trip to Newfoundland than a long one in doubling Cape Horn? Does casting the lines for cod require greater skill, dexterity, strength, or courage, than harpooning the whale? Is more learned in a fishing smack or fore-and-aft schooner of five or forty tons than in a whaling ship of one thousand or more tons? The smack has no yards, but two masts, and three sails—jib, foresail, and mainsail—all managed by halliards or ropes and pulleys, without getting off decks; the sails are unfurled or furled by pulling or letting go a rope. But the great whale ship has its three masts, its twenty-odd sails rising one above the other to the top gallants, and its sixteen or more yards supporting the sails—the very names of which are unknown to the cod fisherman, because never used by him. He has not to go aloft to furl or reef sails, and could not if ordered. He never learns the duties or even the dialect of a whaler, or merchantman, or war vessel; and on board of them would have no advantage over the land-lubber, except in walking the deck, and escaping sea-sickness. The mere inspection of a smack and a square-rigged ship will show that the former is no school on which to learn how to manage the latter. The contrast is as great as between a log cabin and the labyrinth of Crete; and the cod fisherman would scarcely be more at fault in the labyrinth than in the ship.

I do not utter these things without some authority. I understand from naval officers that all the advantage a cod fisherman has over a mere "land-lubber" is in having learned to "rough it," to walk the deck, and escape sea-sickness; but they say that they would rather take a raw recruit who had learned nothing than to take a cod fisherman whom they would have to unlearn before they could teach. I hold in my hand the Plymouth Rock, published in one of the fishing districts of New England, in which I find this language:

"The reasons why cod fishermen can never become proficient as 'ordinary seamen' are too familiar to every man upon the sea-coast to need to be repeated, but to others they may not be uninteresting. The cod fishing vessels are, in the first place, all 'fore-and-aft schooners,' and admitting the crew of each vessel to be permanent, or employed year by year in the same vessel, they obtain no knowledge of square-rigged vessels, and experienced shipmasters aver that to unlearn them of habits acquired on board the fishing vessels requires vastly more labor and patience than to take young men who have never been to sea at all. But the men who are engaged as fishermen are almost entirely a 'floating population,' a large proportion foreigners, who go a fishing for a season, sometimes for relaxation from other employments, sometimes from curiosity, but hardly ever with the idea of making seamanship a permanent business."

Such is, also, the testimony of the Patriot, published at Barnstable, the largest fishing district, which says:

"Whilst it affords to the foreigner an opportunity to acquire seamanship, it encourages our own young men into the fisheries, who would otherwise enter immediately into the merchant service, where they would learn twice or thrice as fast. Besides, the boy who once became a fisherman, is often led to embrace it as a profession for life—a business the poorest, the hardest, the worst of almost any under the light of the sun. Thus, the boy, who, if he had first entered the merchant service, would have arisen to competency and respect, is, by entering upon this service, induced to continue in it, and is, in effect, induced to adopt a business which he would never have adopted if this same bounty had not encouraged the business."

"The foreigner is advanced in his interests by fishing, because he learns ordinary seamanship, and beyond this he generally aspires not. But the American fails to learn that seamanship which is to advance him to his hoped-for situation in a merchantman. The moment he seeks even a mate's berth in a merchant vessel, because he has previously been one on a dozen fishing voyages, that moment he finds himself mistaken. He is told that his past experience is worth just nothing at all! This is true to the very letter, and hundreds can testify to this truth. If he goes into the merchant service, he has got to learn seamanship all over again, and his past tuition counts him just nothing at all. He has merely lost his time by going a fishing, encouraged by a bounty."

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to ask him if he knows that the editors of each of those papers are custom-house officers, who are ready to do the dirtiest work of any Administration when they suppose any question may be an Administration measure?

Mr. CLAY. I do not know it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know they are.

Mr. CLAY. I do not think they are. Mr. Bates is the editor of the Plymouth Rock, the paper from which I read. I think he is not a custom-house officer.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, he is.

Mr. CLAY. Who is the editor of the Patriot? I cannot now say.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Spinney—a custom-house officer.

Mr. CLAY. Well, sir; the custom-house officers of New England are a very corrupt and depraved set, if what the Senator says be true; for it is the common testimony furnished by most of them, and not furnished for this occasion, but through a series of years past; and I am not willing to think so badly of his constituents as he himself seems to think.

Now, Mr. President, I say, if it be true, as alleged, that the cod fishery is the peculiar nursery of seamen, it imposes upon the advocates of that opinion a response to the question: how it happens that the merchantmen, or the whalers, of a thousand or more tons, of more complex rigging, of twenty or more sails, of sixteen or more yards, making voyages of twenty thousand miles or more, spending years of "business in the great waters," are not as good schools for seamen as the cod fishery, which employs schooners or fishing smacks of sixty-five tons or less, which are engaged but four months a year in cruising around the coast or islands of New England, or on the banks of Newfoundland? The framers of these laws did not regard them as the peculiar nurseries of seamen, neither did they design by the laws to make them the nurseries of seamen. This is shown by the language of the acts from which I have read, but it is further evidenced by these facts: all these allowances were contingent on the salt duty which they always accompanied; they are always found in the salt acts, and not in the fishing code. We have a code regulating the fisheries quite as old as the Government; and if they were intended to be fostered as nurseries of seamen, there would be the proper place to find these bounties; but you find them always annexed to the salt duty. The condition of the allowance was the quantity of fish caught and exported which had been cured with foreign salt. The same allowance, up to 1813, was made to the exporters of salt provisions, of beef and pork. Can it be supposed that Congress intended to raise seamen out of the farmers of the West? Can it be expected that Congress intended to nurture seamen of those who never went to sea? This proposition at once shows the absurdity of contending that these laws were intended as the nursery of seamen. It imputes to their framers the folly of the fond mother who advised her son not to go into the water until he learned how to swim? Moreover, it will be found that all these laws were for brief periods—the longest of them extended only for ten years, the next for seven years, and several of them but for two years. Did Congress expect to train a nursery of seamen in two, seven, or even ten years? Lastly, all these laws applied to foreigners as well as citizens of the United States up to 1817. For thirty-odd years this bounty or drawback was paid to foreigners as well as natives or naturalized citizens. No distinction was made. At this day, the law does not exclude foreigners, for the word used is "persons," and not citizens; and at this day, as testified by the collectors to whom I have referred, and by the papers from which I have just read, and which I will not trouble the Senate with reading now, many of those persons employed in these fisheries are foreigners. They represent that they can get foreign fishermen for the coast or banks of Newfoundland for a much lower price than seamen at home, and they go out and employ them there.

But, sir, we are told that the fisheries cannot live without this bounty. Suppose that to be true: is it the duty of Congress to foster any occupation which cannot support itself? Whence do we derive the power to become almoners of public charity, and to provide for those who cannot take care of themselves? But, sir, any one who has examined the table appended to the report which I had the honor to submit some time ago, will see that, according to the reports of the fishermen themselves, this, so far from being a languishing business, ought to be very flourishing. In compliance with a law of Massachusetts, the assessors of the several towns in past years have been required to return the capital invested, the men employed, and gross proceeds of every occupation within the State. I find that in 1837 they reported the vessels employed in the mackerel and cod fisheries at one thousand two hundred and ninety, the tonnage at seventy-six thousand and eighty-nine, the hands employed at eleven thousand one hundred and forty-six, the capital invested at $2,683,176, the aggregate value of the proceeds, $3,203,559, making one hundred and nineteen per cent. of gross proceeds upon the capital invested! In 1845, I find that the gross proceeds exceeded one hundred and nineteen per cent. upon the capital invested! In 1855, I find that the average per cent. of gross proceeds was nearly seventy-six per cent. After deducting fifty per cent. for expenses, yet it yielded an average profit of thirty-eight per cent.; and after superadding to this deduction of fifty per cent., sixty-three dollars for each man employed, (which Mr. Scudder says is all that they get), still the average amounts to nearly twenty-one per cent.; and after allowing $100 per man in addition to the discount of fifty per cent. of the gross proceeds, still the average exceeds eleven per cent. Thus it appears that this business, far from being a losing or decaying one, quite equals, if it does not exceed, in profits any other business in the country.

But, Mr. President, to whose benefit does this bounty inure? Not to the fishermen, but to the two or three thousand owners of fishing vessels. Such is the common testimony of the collectors on this subject. Such is the testimony of the special agent of the Treasury Department sent to look into the fisheries, and to report their condition. Such is impliedly the admission of the owners of the fishing vessels themselves; for they concede that they do not observe the law which requires them to divide the proceeds of a cruise in proportion to the fish taken by each man, and that, in violation of the law and the express regulations of the Department, some of the owners take half to themselves, and divide the other half equally among the crew. If they will violate the law in one particular, why will they not do so in every other? To whom is this money paid? To the owners of the fishing vessels. What officer or agent of the Government supervises its division among the fishermen? No one. It is left solely to the discretion and the conscience of the owner of the fishing vessel. He is the arbiter of his own cause, in violation of every principle of juridical justice. Are avarice and self-interest stronger than justice and generosity? Are men kinder to others than to themselves? Can any one believe that Congress can make bargains for these men, and that they will observe them strictly though it be to their own prejudice? Why may they not stipulate that the fishermen shall have so much for the voyage, less the amount of the bounty? Is the bounty no inducement to the enterprise? It is either an inducement, or it is not. If it be no inducement to the fishermen to engage in the cruise, then there is no reason why it should be continued. If it be an inducement, then the fishermen can afford to ask less from their employers, the owners of the fishing vessels, and no doubt do take less, and thus it inures to the benefit of the owners.

Another reason why I believe the two or three thousand owners of fishing vessels generally enjoy all of this bounty is, that the fishermen are frequently changed during a season. They go out one voyage, return, are discharged, and other fishermen are taken. Such is the report of all the collectors; and, if this be true, none of these fishermen are entitled, according to law, to any of the bounty; and thus it may happen that the owners of the fishing vessels may realize the entire bounty, as is charged.

Mr. President, according to the experience of England, of France, and of Holland, such bounties are wholly inexpedient. They have endeavored, by a system of bounties, to build up their herring and whale fisheries, and they have signally failed. But I need not go abroad to prove the inexpediency of these bounties. Let any Senator compare the increase of the whale and herring fisheries with the cod fisheries, and he will say at once that these bounties have not redounded to the advantage of the cod fisheries. Our whale fishermen, without any bounty whatever from the Government, though competing with the fishermen of the greatest commercial countries of Europe, though competing with the fishermen of England, of Holland, and of France, who were paid large premiums and large bounties on this interest, have outstripped them all. A few fishing tows in New England, without bounty, without Government patronage or aid, have more tonnage and seamen in the whale fishery than England, with all the bounties and premiums and remissions of duties extended to her whale fishermen through a series of years.

It is sufficient to condemn this bounty system to show that it is demoralizing. The late Secretary of the Treasury says, substantially, that it is a premium offered for frauds and perjuries; and he is sustained in this assertion by the testimony of the collectors from one extreme to the other of the coast of New England. They declare that the laws are not complied with; but that these bounties are realized in violation of the laws. Such is the admission, in effect, of the fishermen themselves. In several of their memorials, which I have read, they declare that they cannot comply with the requisitions of the Department and realize any profit. For instance, the law inhibits them from taking other fish than cod fish during a cod-fishing voyage, and from taking fresh fish to market, and requires that they should confine themselves exclusively to the catching and salt-curing of cod fish. They declare, in their memorials, that they had better give up the bounties than observe this regulation; for that, if they are required to throw their fresh fish overboard, they will sink more money than they can realize from the bounty, as many of the fresh fish they take are worth more than the cod, and the fresh cod will often realize a better price and readier sale than the dried. Yet they claimed and got the bounty. Who can doubt that they also saved and sold their fresh fish?

But, sir, it is demoralizing in another aspect. It encourages a sentiment already too pervading in the country, of dependence on the Government for support. Such a sentiment is baneful to individual as well as national prosperity. It paralyzes the industry, enervates the mind, and enfeebles the will of man to teach him to look to Government as a natural or foster parent for support and aid in every enterprise. It keeps him in his minority through life, and he can never feel or exercise the freedom, independence, and self-reliance of mature manhood. It reduces him to a state of pupillage, in which he cannot think without instruction, or act without assistance. It discourages enterprise, enslaves the spirit, suppresses noble aspirations, and prevents brave efforts. Unsatisfied desire is the natural aliment of human exertion, whether it be mental or physical, and without it man would cease to labor. Labor, by divine decree, is the condition of success, and without it nothing great or valuable is achieved. Poverty is the nurse of great souls, and necessity the parent of heroic efforts; and the fountain of the Muses, bursting from a barren rock, is an apt emblem of the hard source whence spring the noblest aspirations of the mind, and the most glorious achievements of the hand. Whenever Government undertakes to supply man's wants and relieve his labors, it violates a law of nature which will sooner or later vindicate its own majesty.

Suppose it were possible for this Government to supply all the wants and satisfy all the desires of its citizens—to give lands to the landless, houses to the shelterless, food to the hungry, and clothing to the naked: how long would science, art, literature, freedom, religion, anything that ennobles man, and elevates him above the beast, survive such an experiment? How long would we have a Government worth preserving, or freemen to preserve it? Such a Government would prove a greater curse than that of Adam, and more intolerable than the vilest tyranny of barbaric autocrats.

Sir, I demand the repeal of these bounties because they are unconstitutional; they are unjust, they are inexpedient, they are demoralizing. I demand the repeal of the laws under which they are drawn because the inducements held out for their enactment have ceased to exist; because the reason of them has ceased; and because the effect of them is far different from that which was intended, or expected, or desired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Thursday at half past twelve o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

Mr. CLAY. I hope not. I trust we shall get through with this business. I am sure the Senator from Maine must be as familiar with this subject as I am. He ought to be more so. It is matter of recent study with me, and has been a subject familiar to him from his childhood, probably? I trust that we shall go on with this matter, and get done with the question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish to say that if this bill is postponed, I believe another bill of some public interest may be passed this evening; and that is, the bill amendatory of the act of 1852 in regard to public printing. If this is postponed, I give notice now that I shall ask to have that bill taken up and disposed of.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would myself, under ordinary circumstances, prefer to postpone this bill until to-morrow; but laboring, as I have been all this day, under a severe headache which arises from the stomach—it is a bilious headache—I know full well that I shall not be clear of it to-morrow. I think I have some knowledge of this matter. The people I represent have a deep interest in it. I do not wish to be driven to speak here when I am indisposed. I therefore ask the Senate to postpone the bill until the day after to-morrow only.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must now make the motion of which I gave notice before, and I am strengthened in my determination to press it, by the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, a Senator whose constituents, perhaps, are more deeply interested in the subject under discussion than those of any other Senator on the floor. In obedience to that rule of courtesy which the Senate took great pleasure in awarding to the gentleman from Alabama, this bill should go over until the day after to-morrow, and I feel it my duty to renew the motion I made before, to postpone the prior orders, and take up the Oregon bill. I think we shall be able to finish it to-morrow, and I do not know of any better time for it, any time when it would less incommode the public business than to take it up now. I trust the Senate therefore, will agree to the motion to postpone the prior orders and take up the bill for the admission of Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to postpone this bill until Thursday at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Perhaps he will yield to my motion to take up the Oregon bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I prefer my motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well; let the question be taken on that.

Mr. CLAY. I trust the bill will not be deferred beyond to-morrow. If the Senator should come in to-morrow and complain of being unwell, of course it must be laid over; but I have spoken myself to-day, with a headache, under some disadvantage; and yet I have done so because I was unwilling that this matter should be longer deferred. If it be postponed until the day after to-morrow, the bill of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] will be brought up, and this will lose its precedence, and may be deferred until the close of the session. I wish to have a vote on the bill as soon as practicable. I will say, let it lie over until to-morrow; I am willing that it be deferred at present, as I do not wish the Senator from Maine to go on at this time. If he then complains of being unwell, perhaps some advocate of that interest may go on.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will say to the Senator that I would be ready to proceed at this moment but from the nature of my health. I am willing, although I know quite well what will be my condition to-morrow, to agree to postpone the bill until to-morrow. I do not want it to lose its order; and I move to postpone it until to-morrow at one o'clock, and that it be the order of the day for that hour.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I move to postpone the prior orders to take up the Oregon bill. If the Senator from Maine will withdraw his motion, I will submit that.

Mr. HAMLIN. What becomes of this, then?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It goes over until to-morrow, as a matter of course.

Mr. SLIDELL. The first question is, whether this bill shall be postponed until to-morrow. That is a separate and distinct proposition. I shall urge, with the permission of the Senator from Tennessee, the taking up of his bill as the next special order, if this be passed over now. We have but five weeks of the session left, and if every measure of this sort is to undergo a regular discussion and set speeches, we shall probably not dispose of it for several days, and I certainly shall object to the consumption of a very great deal of time in the discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Illinois to propose to the Senator from Maine some modification of his motion. Does the Senator from Maine accept it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask him to allow me to move to postpone the prior orders, and take up the Oregon bill. That will leave this as the unfinished business.

Mr. SLIDELL. I submit if that is a proper motion which can be entertained without the unanimous consent of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot tell until he hears what the proposition is.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It can be entertained with the consent of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would be glad if the Senator from Maine would make his motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am willing to yield the floor to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I make the motion to postpone all prior orders and take up the Oregon bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will this bill come up, then, to-morrow at one o'clock?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It will.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Gentlemen make agreements here to which some of us are not parties. The honorable Senators from Maine and Illinois propose their agreement. There is a direct division which can be made of the motion, and I must insist that that division shall be made. In the first place, to postpone is one thing—

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator will allow me. I see the point. I will move to postpone this question until to-morrow at one o'clock. When that is decided, whoever gets the floor will make whatever motion he pleases.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Exactly. Then I shall beg to say that I am aware that the courtesies of gentlemen very often crush measures equally with the opposition of gentlemen. I shall not sit here any longer and see this done, so far as bills which I propose to present to the consideration of the Senate are concerned. The expenditures of the Government are $70,000,000 a year, and the bill which I propose presents a relief of about one seventieth annually throughout all time, unless the laws are changed after it shall have been enacted. That certainly is considerably over ten per cent. upon our expenditures. I think such a measure should receive our attention.

If this bill be postponed, I hope we shall consider what we can best do with the residue of this afternoon, and therefore I will not concede, so far as I am concerned, to the taking up of the bill for the admission of Oregon, when I know that it will not and cannot be admitted within this evening, whilst, on the contrary, I am convinced that we can pass to-day the bill which I propose as an amendment to the existing printing laws that will produce an effect such as I have named. I do not propose to vote for taking up the Oregon bill at this hour, which I see by the clock is three o'clock. I shall vote for the postponement until to-morrow of this question, as a measure of relief to the Senator from Maine, who wishes to address the Senate on the subject which has already been discussed. That being done, I hope we may be permitted, in the mere fragment of time that remains of this day's session, to take up a measure which will really give some protection against what heretofore has produced a general outcry throughout the whole country, and particularly throughout the Senate—the vices that have accompanied the whole system of printing, and which the committee I represent here anxiously desire to have amended and prevented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859; and it was signed by the Vice President.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 218) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," approved August 26, 1852.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust that will not be taken up, because I desire the Senate to take up the Oregon bill. If this shall be voted down, I will make that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I trust the Senate will agree to my motion, and dispose of the bill, for I do not anticipate that it will give rise to a lengthened debate. I will concisely state the reasons why this bill should be passed when it is taken up. I am not disposed to consume the time of the Senate; but if this bill is to be passed at this session it ought to be sent to the House of Representatives at once. It has been maturely considered by the committees of both Houses, and they all concur in the belief that it ought to be passed.

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—27.
NAYS—Messrs. Brodick, Chandler, Colamer, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fossenden, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Harlan, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, and Stuart—18.

The bill was thereupon taken up as in Committee of the Whole, and the Clerk proceeded to read it.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest that we shall understand it better if the chairman of the Committee on Printing will take it up and analyze it for us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent its further reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire that it may be read through.

Mr. EVANS. I desire to hear it all read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill being called for, the Clerk must proceed.

The Clerk accordingly proceeded to read the bill. The first section provides that there shall be a Superintendent of Public Printing, who shall receive for his services a salary of $3,000 per annum, and who shall give bond, with two sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the penalty of $20,000, for the faithful discharge of his duties under the law. It is required that he shall be a practical printer, versed in the various branches of the art of printing; he is to hold his office for two years, commencing with the first day of the session of each Congress, and until his successor shall be duly appointed and qualified. He is to be allowed four clerks, who shall each receive a salary of $1,800 per annum; and one messenger, at an annual salary of $1,200.

The second section makes it his duty to supervise the execution of all such public printing, binding, and engraving as shall be provided to be executed under the provisions of the law; to inspect such printing, binding, and engraving, during the progress of its execution; to see that all such work is executed in a neat and workmanlike manner, with fidelity and dispatch; to note every failure or delinquency of duty on the part of any public printer, binder, or engraver; to state the fact of such delinquencies upon his records, and from time to time report the same to the Joint Committee of Congress on Printing. He is to be prohibited from receiving any printing, binding, or engraving which is not executed in strict conformity with the provisions of the law, or of the different contracts which may be made under its provisions, in all particulars, and in the best manner, but it is to be his duty to reject all work not so executed, and at once to report the fact of such rejection to the Joint Committee on Printing, in order that such proceedings may be had under the law in the matter as the committee shall deem advisable.

He is to receive from the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives all matter ordered by Congress to be printed; and from the several heads of Departments and chiefs of bureaus all matter ordered by them, respectively, to be printed at public expense, and to keep a faithful account of the same, in the order in which it shall be received, in books to be kept by him for that purpose. He is required to record the date of receipt of every order for printing, the designation of every document or job so required to be printed, and the number of copies of each ordered; he is to deliver every document or job ordered to be printed, for the use of either House of Congress, to the Printer of that House for whose use the same is intended, (except in the cases specified in the eighth section,) in the order in which the same shall be received by him; and to deliver all of the printing ordered to be executed for the different Departments to the Public Printer or Printers, in the order of its receipt, as nearly as may be. He is to furnish to the Public Printer or Printers, at such times as it may be required, all the paper of the different kinds and qualities necessary for the execution of all such printing, taking receipts for it in a book to be kept for that purpose; and to see that all such printing is executed upon the paper so furnished. When any such document or job shall have been executed to the satisfaction of the Superintendent, and shall have been accepted by him, the Printer is to be required to deliver it in such manner as the Superintendent may direct; if required to be bound, into the hands of the proper binder, taking his receipt for it; or, if not required to be bound, into the hands of some proper officer of that House of Congress or Department or bureau for whose use the same is intended, taking his receipt therefor. Such receipt is to be delivered by the Printer to the Superintendent, together with a printed copy of every such document or job; and the Superintendent, thereupon, will note upon his books, opposite to the previous record of such document or job, the date of its receipt, the number of pages or ems it contains, the quantity and cost of the paper required for its execution, and the amount allowed by him under the law for the printing. The accounts of the Public Printer for every job of printing executed is to be certified to by the Superintendent, and the amount allowed by him for each such job under the provisions of the law is to be stated in the account and certificate; and the accounts are to be made payable at the Treasury of the United States, and be subject to the control of the accounting officers in like manner as other public accounts, but not to be assignable or transferable by indorsement or delivery to any third party.

The Superintendent of Public Printing is not to be, directly or indirectly, interested in the business of the public printing, or in any material to be used by the Public Printer, or in any contract for furnishing paper to Congress, or to any Department or bureau of the Government of the United States, or in the binding for Congress or for any of the Departments or bureaus; or in the furnishing of any of the materials used in the public binding; or in the engraving or lithographing required to be executed for any of the public printing, or for any Department or bureau of the Government, or in any contract for the same. For any violation of this provision, the Superintendent of the Public Printing is to forfeit his office, and may be indicted before the criminal court for the District of Columbia, and, if found guilty, be imprisoned in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia for any term not less than one nor more than five years, and, in addition thereto, may be fined in any sum from one thousand to ten thousand dollars.

The fifth section provides for the election of a Public Printer for each House of Congress, to do the public printing for the Congress for which he may be chosen, and such printing for the Executive Departments and bureaus of the Government of the United States as may be delivered to him to be printed by the Superintendent of the Public Printing, under the direction of the President of the United States. The following rates of compensation are to be paid for the work done. For bills and joint resolutions—for composition, per page, fifty cents; for presswork, folding, and stitching, fifty-six cents per thousand pages. For reports of committees and the Journals of both Houses, with indexes, and the executive documents of each House, embracing messages from the President, reports from the Executive Departments, bureaus, and offices, and documents and statements communicated therewith, with indexes; resolutions and other documents from State Legislatures; memorials, petitions, treaties, and confidential documents for the Senate, and all other matter printed in octavo form; for composition, per page, octavo—for small pica plain, one dollar; for small pica rule, $1 50; for brevier plain, $1 50; for brevier rule, two dollars; for nonpareil rule, $3 75; for the composition of tables larger than octavo size, per one thousand ems, seventy cents; but the page of octavo size is to contain not less than one thousand six hundred ems when printed in small pica, or two thousand eight hundred ems when printed in brevier; and the body of all plain matter is to be printed in small pica, except extracts, yeas and nays, and addenda, which are to be printed with brevier type.

All rule and figure work is to be printed in royal octavo form with brevier type, each page containing not less than two thousand eight hundred ems; and if it cannot be brought into a royal octavo page with brevier type, so as to be understood with facility, it is to be printed with nonpareil type, each page containing not less than four thousand two hundred ems; and when it cannot be brought into a royal octavo page with nonpareil type, so as to be read with facility, it is to be printed with brevier type in a broadside, showing the whole table at one view, and be so filled that it can be bound in a royal octavo volume. When matter is leaded, the composition is to be counted as if the matter were printed solid and not leaded. For presswork, folding, and stitching of royal octavo size, twenty-six cents per thousand pages is to be paid. For presswork, folding, and stitching of each table larger than royal octavo size, one dollar per thousand copies. The following deductions are to be made from the presswork, folding, and stitching additional numbers to the number usually ordered by Congress of matter included in the foregoing specifications, to wit: When the number ordered exceeds five thousand and does not exceed ten thousand, two per centum; When the number exceeds ten thousand and does not exceed twenty thousand, five per centum upon the excess above ten thousand; When the number exceeds twenty thousand, forty per centum upon the excess above twenty thousand: The following deductions on account of folding and stitching copies reserved for binding are to be made: For royal octavo size, per page, for each hundred copies, one quarter of a cent; for each table larger than octavo, one quarter of a cent; and the following additional charge is to be allowed for trimming, folding, stitching, and inserting each map, chart, diagram, or plat, in the copies not reserved for binding; for every hundred copies, fifteen cents. There is to be allowed for the presswork on treaties, reports, and other documents, when ordered to be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate, at the following rates: For the presswork, folding, and stitching of sixty-five copies, six cents per page when of the royal octavo size, and one dollar per page for sixty-five copies, when the matter cannot be contained in the royal octavo page in any type hereinbefore specified; and allowance is to be made as the same rates for any greater number of copies than sixty-five. For the Calendars and general orders; for composition, per page, one dollar and thirty-six cents is to be allowed; and for presswork, folding, and stitching, fifty-six cents per thousand pages.

For every other description of printing ordered by Congress, or by Executive Departments, not before specified: for composition, whether plain or rule and figure work, fifty cents per thousand ems; and each page is to be estimated to contain the following number of ems: Quarto post—small pica, two thousand one hundred; long primer, two thousand five hundred; and brevier, three thousand five hundred. Foolscap—small pica, three thousand; long primer, three thousand five hundred; and brevier, five thousand five hundred. Demy—small pica, five thousand five hundred; long primer, six thousand two hundred; and brevier, nine thousand five hundred. Folio post—small pica, six thousand five hundred; long primer, seven thousand five hundred; and brevier, eleven thousand. Medium—small pica, seven thousand; long primer, eight thousand two hundred; and brevier, twelve thousand two hundred. Royal—small pica, eight thousand; long primer, nine thousand two hundred; and brevier, fourteen thousand. Imperial—small pica, twelve thousand; long primer fourteen thousand; and brevier, twenty-one thousand.

When the printed matter occupies the whole side of the sheet upon which it is printed, and known as a broadside, double the above mentioned number of ems is to be allowed, each page of a broadside covering the same space as two pages, as estimated for above. Every other description of matter is to be allowed for according to actual measurement; and when type larger than small pica is used, it is to be measured and allowed as if in small pica.

For presswork, (except for printing post-bills, which are to be printed on paper not less than sixteen by twenty-six inches, and for printing on parchment,) including folding and stitching, or either, when necessary, for every two hundred and fifty sheets, when printed on one side, one dollar, and when printed on both sides, two dollars, and at the same rate for any greater number; and when the number required is less than two hundred and fifty, it is to be counted as two hundred and fifty. There is to be paid for printing the post-bills at the rate of one dollar per thousand sheets, and at the rate of ten dollars per thousand for printing parchments; but nothing is to be allowed for altering post-bills, when the alteration consists in a mere change of the postmaster's name, and the name of his post office.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That is the law as it now stands, with but little material change. The principal change is the reduction upon the quartoes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the remaining sections.

The sixth section provides that whenever any document shall be ordered to be printed by either House of Congress, the same shall, unless otherwise specially directed in the manner thereafter stated, be printed in royal octavo form, on supercalendered paper, measuring twenty-four by thirty-eight inches, and weighing forty-eight pounds to the ream of four hundred and eighty sheets; but whenever, in the opinion of the Joint Committee on Printing, the character of any document ordered to be printed may render such change necessary and proper, the Superintendent of the Public Printing shall, by the written direction of such committee, cause the size of the page to be changed to quarto; and when any document shall be printed in quarto form, the same shall be printed upon supercalendered and sized paper measuring twenty-four by thirty-eight inches, and weighing fifty-six pounds to the ream of four hundred and eighty sheets; but in no case are the prices paid to the Public Printer for the composition and presswork of such quarto work to exceed pro rata the prices paid for the printing of the congressional documents in octavo form; and the paper for every other description of printing is to be of such size and quality as may be designated by the Superintendent of Public Printing. The printed sheets of all documents ordered by Congress to be printed, and which are required to be bound, are to be thoroughly dried and pressed, under the direction of the Superintendent of Public Printing, before being bound, provided the cost shall not exceed twenty-five cents per ream; and all accounts for such drying and pressing are to be settled in the same manner as the accounts of the Public Printer.

The seventh section provides that the Public Printer shall be required by the Superintendent of Public Printing to print and return all bills, reports, and joint resolutions, emanating from either House, and ordered to be printed, at such times as the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House of Representatives shall require; and the Public Printer, upon the order of the Superintendent, is to be required to work at night as well as during the day, upon the public work, when the exigencies of the public service require it. When any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document is to be done by the Printer of that House which first ordered the same; and whenever the same person or the same firm shall be Printer for both Houses of Congress, and both Houses shall order the same document to be printed, composition is not to be charged but once for that document, unless, from the length of time between the several orders, recomposition may be rendered necessary; and has been actually performed; and no sum is to be paid to the Printer for altering the headings from the form in which he printed them first to the form or forms in which such documents shall afterwards be printed.

The ninth section provides that it shall not be lawful for the head of any department of the Government, or any officer or agent thereof, to print or cause to be printed, at the public expense, any report he has made, or may make, to the President of the United States, to the head of any of the Departments, or to Congress; or to have engraved or printed, at the public expense, any map, chart, diagram, view, or other illustration intended to accompany the same, unless an appropriation shall have been previously made for such printing and engraving; and no appropriation made for any other purpose, nor any part thereof, shall be transferred or used for such engraving or printing, unless specifically authorized by law.

Provision is then made for the election by the respective Committees on Printing of each House of Congress, of a binder or binders to do the binding of all extra numbers of such documents as shall be ordered by either House of the Congress for which he or they may be elected; and the extra numbers of all documents ordered by either House of Congress, the size of which shall not be less than two hundred and fifty pages, are to be plainly and substantially bound in such manner as may be directed by the Superintendent under the direction of the respective Committees on Printing of each House, at a cost not exceeding twelve and a half cents per volume, if printed in octavo form, and at a cost not exceeding fifty cents per volume, if printed in quarto form. The binder is to give bonds, with good security, to the satisfaction of the respective Committees on Printing, to execute all binding which may be delivered to him, with all proper despatch, and in strict conformity with the samples or styles which may be adopted. Whenever any such binding shall have been executed by the binder, the manner in which he shall dispose of it is prescribed.

Whenever any charts, maps, diagrams, views, or other engravings, accompany any document ordered to be printed by either House of Congress, the Superintendent of the Public Printing will first examine the same, and report to the Committee on Printing of the Senate, if the document is ordered by that body, or to the Committee on Engraving of the House, if by that body, or to both, acting as a joint committee, if the document is ordered to be printed by both Houses, whether, in his opinion, the engraving and printing of such illustrations are necessary, and the manner and style in which the same should be executed; and if the committee or committees shall agree to print them, the Superintendent is to advertise in such paper or papers, and for such time as may be directed by the committee, for proposals for the execution of the work, and it will be awarded to the lowest bidder, if the person making the proposal is a practical engraver or lithographer, and in every respect qualified to execute the bids. He is to enter into bonds with good security, to be approved by the committee, to execute the work in strict accordance with the bids, and within such time as shall be required for the public service, and in the best manner, and to make faithful return of all public property intrusted to his charge. The Superintendent will furnish all the paper required for the execution of the printing of all such engravings; but in default of any contractor to execute all such work in strict accordance with the provisions of his contract, and to the satisfaction of the Superintendent, the proper committee of the House ordering the work will have power to annul such contract, and cause the securities on the bond of such contractor to be prosecuted by the Solicitor of the Treasury of the United States in the circuit court of the United States in the district in which the contractor resides, for any damage or loss accruing to the United States from the non-fulfillment of any such contract. And if, during the recess of Congress, any charts, maps, views, diagrams, or other illustrations are sent to the Superintendent, which, in his opinion, are necessary to the proper understanding of any work previously ordered to be printed by either House of Congress, or which, by being engraved and printed in advance for the illustration of any document which is regularly ordered to be printed at each session, will materially expedite the completion of any such work, he will spread the facts in full upon his record, and proceed to procure the engraving and printing of such illustrations by public advertisement, and open all such proposals as may be received in the presence of the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the clerk of the Committee on Printing, or any two of them, whose duty it shall be to attend, upon notification by the Superintendent, for this purpose; and the Superintendent will award the contract for engraving and printing all such illustrations in the same manner and under the same restrictions as are before provided for by the respective committees during the sessions of Congress; and at the session of Congress immediately succeeding such recess the Superintendent is to report in full to the proper committee his action in these matters, for their consideration and approval.

Whenever any account for any engraving or printing of any illustration shall be presented to the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House for payment, it must be accompanied by the certificate of the Superintendent that the work charged for has been executed to his satisfaction, upon the paper furnished by him, and has been received by him; that the price is the same allowed by the proper committee of the House ordering the same; and that all the engraving and printing charged for has been executed within proper time; and no account for any such engraving or printing will be paid by the Secretary or Clerk unless accompanied by the certificate of the Superintendent that the prescribed requirements have been complied with.

The Superintendent is to keep a strict account of all maps, charts, views, or other illustrations of any work ordered to be executed; file all bids for the execution of them; enter the name of each bidder whose proposals shall be accepted, the amount allowed by the committee for the work; the time within which it is required to be executed; and when the work has been received and accepted by him, he will also enter the date and amount of the account presented by any such engraver or printer, which must be certified by the Superintendent.

The Superintendent is to advertise annually in one or more newspapers of general circulation in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, for the space of sixty days prior to the 1st of December, for sealed proposals to furnish the Government of the United States all paper which may be necessary for the execution of the public printing or engraving, of quality and in quantity to be specified in the advertisement, from year to year; open such proposals as may be made in the presence of the Joint Committee on Printing, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of December annually, or as soon thereafter as the joint committee shall be appointed, and award the contract for furnishing all the paper, or such class thereof as may be bid for, to the lowest bidder, whose sample, accompanying his bid, shall most nearly approximate to the quality of paper (size, weight, and texture all considered) advertised for. The sample offered with the bid accepted is to be preserved by the Superintendent, and it will be his duty to compare these with the paper furnished by the public contractor; and he will not accept any paper from the contractor or contractors which does not conform to the accepted samples. The Superintendent of the Public Printing is to deliver the paper for the printing or engraving of the United States upon the requisition of the Public Printer or engraver, and to charge him therewith; and as the printing or engraving is returned, and passed by the Superintendent, he is to credit the Public Printer or engraver with the quantity used in the public service. It will also be the duty of the Superintendent to have the requisitions of the Printer or engraver, and the returns of paper by the Printer or engraver, balanced at least once in each year, or oftener, if, in the opinion of the Superintendent, it may be necessary; and in default thereof, to report the same to Congress for such proceedings as Congress may direct. In default of any contractor, under this law, to comply with his contract in furnishing the paper in proper time and of proper quality, the Superintendent is authorized to enter into a new contract, under the sanction of the Joint Committee on Printing, with the lowest and best bidder for the interests of the Government amongst those whose proposals were rejected at the last annual letting, if it be practicable to do so, and if not, then to advertise for proposals, and award the contract to the lowest and best bidder; and during any interval which is thus created by the new advertisement for such proposals the Superintendent will have power to purchase in the open market all such paper as may be necessary for the public service at the lowest price. For any increase of cost to the Government in procuring a supply of paper for the use of the Government, the contractor in default and his securities will be charged with and held responsible for the same, and be prosecuted upon their bond by the Solicitor of the Treasury, in the name of the United States, in the circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defaulting contractor resides; and to enable the Solicitor to do so the Superintendent will report to him the default on its happening, with a full statement of all the facts in the case.

Provision is made for the appointment of a committee consisting of three members of the Senate, and three members of the House of Representatives, to be called the Joint Committee on the Public Printing, to whom are to be referred all motions to print extra copies of documents or other matter for distribution; and it will be their duty, if they deem the printing of such extra copies necessary and proper, to report by bill or joint resolution authorizing the same, together with an estimate of the entire cost of the work for printing, paper, engraving, and binding, in detail; and no document, report, or other matter, will be ordered to be printed by either House of Congress until all the manuscript, together with the original drawings intended to illustrate the same, shall have been completed and ready for engraving and printing. And neither House of Congress, nor any Department of the Government, is to have power out of its contingent fund to order the payment of the whole cost, or any part of the cost of any public printing of that class which it is enacted shall only be printed by joint resolution or act of Congress; but this act is not intended to prevent either House of Congress from ordering the printing of extra copies of any document, report, or other matter, for distribution, when the number of pages do not exceed two hundred and fifty. The Joint Committee on Printing is to exercise a general supervisory control, under this law, over the Superintendent of the Public Printing; to adopt such rules as may seem to them necessary to remedy any neglect or delay, within the law, to expedite the execution of the public printing, engraving, or congressional binding; and to have power to examine the books, files, and accounts of the Superintendent, at such times as they may deem requisite and proper. They are to decide between the Public Printers, binders, and engravers, and the Superintendent, upon a written appeal or exception taken by them or either of them from any decision of the Superintendent; and upon a written request of the Superintendent are to construe any of the provisions of this law, which construction, made in writing and entered at large upon their minutes, shall have full force and effect as the true intent and meaning of the law. It is further made the duty of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, on the first day of the meeting of each session of Congress, or as soon thereafter as may be, to report to Congress the exact condition of the public printing, binding, and engraving; the amount and cost of all such printing, binding, and engraving; the amount and cost of all paper purchased for the same; and such further information as may be within his knowledge in regard to all matters connected therewith. All acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, will be thereby repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will state to the Senate, as briefly as I can, the results of my examinations in connection with this subject, so as to give to those who wish to pay any attention to this matter, in as short space as possible, as full understanding as I can of the nature, character, and features of this bill. I will state, in the first place, that the committee believe it perfects the present system of public printing. It codifies all the laws in regard to the printing, engraving, and binding for Congress, and the printing for the Executive Departments. Those laws are now very much scattered, and some of them are to be found in the appropriation bills, so that it is frequently impossible for any one not perfectly familiar with these matters to get possession of the laws that control our action. In that respect, the present laws in regard to public printing are exceedingly defective, and codification is required. This bill not only codifies the existing printing laws, but it also makes such amendments as experience has suggested to be necessary and proper. It has been prepared with a great deal of care by the committee which has had special charge of this matter.

In August, 1852, the present printing system was adopted. This bill is the result of all the experience of six years' practical operation. It has been prepared with the constant and faithful aid of the Superintendent and of his office, by the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate; and the committees that have relation to this particular branch of service in the House of Representatives, have also been consulted in each instance. In regard to all those committees, I believe I may say, without being questioned by any man upon earth, that the highest confidence exists in the integrity, in the purity, in the determination of the Superintendent of Printing, now to aid in every respect within his power, to render this system one that will protect the interest of the United States and carry on the public work.

This bill has been submitted to the accounting officers of the Treasury for their views. They had it under consideration, and returned the bill, without being able to suggest any further amendments, and have expressed themselves gratified that it has been brought to the degree of perfection which we have been able to obtain. It has been twice printed, and sent abroad for comment; it has been distributed in the Senate and in the House of Representatives for examination. Many members of the Senate and House of Representatives, after having read over and considered this bill, have suggested amendments, and in every instance, those suggestions which have been made by members of either House, many of whom are practical men, have been considered maturely, and adopted or rejected as we believed they were best calculated for the public interest. In some instances they have been rejected, for the reason that we did not wish, on this occasion, to raise vexed questions, or questions that would defeat the greater objects of the bill, those objects being economy, and the reduction of the public printing to the real uses of the different departments of the Government, more particularly the two branches of Congress. Every suggestion for improvement has invariably been considered by the committee, and adopted or rejected with reference to these objects.

We also have to say that we know the bill is not and cannot be made perfect in a single effort. We also are aware that the session of Congress is now very near its close, and if we bring into a measure of this kind disputed questions they will defeat the passage of any bill, and leave in force those laws which now exist. Those laws leave unlicensed power in each branch of Congress, and in the various Departments of the Government, in the hands of various individuals who are employes of the Government under different branches of the public service, to involve us constantly in expenditures, which, when they are begun—and in the beginning of them there is no control—you can point to no limit. Expenses may now be incurred, and the argument urged that you lose all that has been expended unless you carry on vast schemes of public printing.

The bill, as the committee believe, restrains the license which now exists, and reduces the annual expense of public printing by about the amount of one million dollars, and yet secures to the public interest, secures to the legislation of each branch of Congress, all that may be needed, and all that can be needed. Where more is necessary than the usual number, it but demands, by the terms of the bill, that the concurrent sense of each branch of Congress, irrespective of party or its influences, shall unite, and say that it is for the public interest that a large amount of printing shall be done, and then the larger amount can be obtained. The effect will be to prevent the printing of extra numbers of large documents by the separate order of either House of Congress at the expense of the contingent fund of that House, which the committee believe in many instances produces an unconstitutional expenditure of money, an expenditure which first secures a large contingent fund to each House, and then wastes it on objects which do not meet with the concurrence of both Houses of Congress and the Executive.

The bill may perhaps be supposed to come in conflict with two other plans that are conceived of and discussed in the committees of the other House. One of these is for a printing bureau; the other is for the contract system in regard to all public printing. I will say nothing of the merits of either of those measures. After a concurrent meeting between the committee of this House and the special committee of the House of Representatives, and at the same time uniting the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Engraving of the House of Representatives, we all became satisfied that something ought to be done promptly. All became satisfied that this measure had many features in it which had not been considered or reflected upon by the committees who were settling up other plans, that some of them were necessary to any of those other plans, that at the same time this plan, which is merely a perfection of existing laws that are too defective to be permitted to stay in force any longer as they are, was a concurrent and not a rival scheme. If, hereafter, it be deemed better to have a printing bureau, or to adopt the contract system, this law can be repealed. We only propose now to amend a law which is so utterly defective that it has involved us in the expenditure of millions of dollars annually for the execution of the public printing, and has involved us in schemes the end of which we do not know. Why, sir, there is a single item of public printing which has been in the course of prosecution for the last fifteen years, and is not yet completed, and there is not now, that we are aware of, a solitary entire copy of the work in existence. Thirty volumes have already been printed, and it is not yet complete. I have inquired in our public library, and I cannot find a complete copy of it.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I allude to Wilkes's exploring expedition. That work is not yet completed, and I believe the officers in charge of it are still here, and have been ever since the expedition returned. They have been here so long that I doubt whether they know the names of the ropes that belong to a ship.

Passing from that, there is the Pacific railroad exploring expedition, which has gone up to six or seven volumes, and I do not know where it is to terminate. It has already cost millions of dollars. Then there is Gilliss's exploring expedition, of a similar character; but it is not necessary to go into an enumeration of the various items swelling up the enormous expenditures of public printing.

Mr. COLLAMER. Permit me to ask the Senator whether the publication of which we have received a volume, being the report of the Army officers who went to Europe during the Crimean war, is ended?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not know, but I have no idea that it is ended. Gentlemen inform me that it is not concluded, and I should be glad if you would point me to anything in connection with public printing that is concluded.

One great merit of this bill is that it introduces a system of rigid accountability. Something should be done to arrest the state of things to which I have called attention, and the heads of Departments ought to send off officers who will, under cover of law, extend their publications to such an enormous extent. It gives them a home here, and gives them an immunity from the duties which they owe for the places they hold, and therefore we find so many of our officers engaged here in compiling books. You must stop it somewhere. I do not say that this bill will stop it. I know very well that if a bill were proposed to stop it, personal feeling would be engendered in the hearts of gentlemen, and there would be a long debate. That is not proposed here, and I am sorry to say so. We have been compelled to moderate our demands and not go so far as we thought would be well. We have confined ourselves to something practical, to something which we think we can obtain, which will correct, to a great extent, the evils under which we now suffer.

The Mexican boundary survey is another work of the class to which I before alluded. One of the methods by which these expensive projects are got in, is to ask you to print the usual number. When the printing of Wilkes's expedition was ordered, only one hundred copies were asked. Of many other things we have printed ten thousand, twenty thousand, even thirty thousand copies for a single branch of Congress. The Wilkes expedition began with only one hundred copies, and it is not complete in fifteen years. I am informed, and confidently believe, that it is the most magnificent work ever published; and I suppose we may say it with justice, it is entirely regal, and the most splendid and costly work the world ever knew; and this has been printed by the American Congress. We do not even receive the tribute of having done a magnificent thing. These matters seem to be got up to gratify the personal pride and personal ease of officers who engage in expeditions and surveys, rather than for any other purpose.

I shall not, however, go into that subject, because this bill does not propose to put a definitive end to that, but to restrict the system; to codify and amend the laws in existence, and put all persons connected with the public printing in a position of accountability to the officers of the Treasury, where they are not now accountable at all, in point of fact, so that each step shall be known by Congress, and those gentlemen who wish to oppose these corruptions, or not so much corruptions as vices of the system, shall be able effectually and effectively to get all the facts, and oppose them and defeat them. This is what the bill proposes, and in this respect it puts an end to these difficulties.

Mr. HUNTER. Does it reduce the price of printing?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It reduces the amount of printing; and when you reduce the amount, as a matter of course you reduce the cost of printing. The argument ever has been here, and it has been the most seductive and most fatal argument which has been brought before Congress, that when you have printed the usual number of a document you have incurred the greater portion of the expense, and the multiplication of that order afterwards will cost very little, and you might as well do it. The consequence of yielding to such appeals has been, that this body has ordered twenty-seven thousand copies of a single work to be printed, and the other House one hundred thousand.

This committee, seeking to do strict justice, seeking to curtail and cut down these expenses where it is possible to do so, and to prevent the publication of books of heavy size, have provided that no extra copies of books now required by law to be bound, to wit, of the size of two hundred and fifty pages, shall be ordered to be printed unless by a bill or joint resolution requiring the concurrence of all branches of the law-making power. At present, such propositions are passed by single resolutions of one House, introduced when perhaps no man is noticing what is going on; and they are passed with the knowledge of but very few. This proposition requires all such movements to stand the test of both Houses, receiving three readings in all the usual forms, and being carried to the Executive. If they are not worthy of that class of support, these things should not be printed at all. It is from a disregard of these regular rules of legislation that both branches of Congress have been vying with each other which shall involve the public Treasury to the greatest degree. This is the fact now, and the bill proposes to put a stop to that state of things by providing that the printing of extra copies of all documents exceeding two hundred and fifty pages shall not be ordered unless by the authority of law.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask a question. I understand the Senator to say that the price of printing a work very much depends on the number to be printed. Now, does this bill provide that the whole number to be printed shall be settled before any part of a work is printed?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. This bill does not restrict the Senate or House of Representatives in that respect in ordering any printing for their own use.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not speaking of that; but I ask whether there is any provision by which extra numbers, as they are called, are to be regulated before you make a contract for the ordinary number. It would seem to me that the price of the ordinary number would very much depend upon the number of extra copies which are ordered; and therefore to make the contract properly, with the Printer, the whole number that you want printed should be known in the first place.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would say to the Senator, that under our own rules, and under the law, a proposition to print a document is referred to the Committee on Printing, and that is generally accompanied by a motion to print additional numbers, and then a report upon the whole takes place at once. There is, however, nothing in this bill, and we believe it is impossible for us to introduce into the law any provision, that a member shall not rise after the usual number of a document has been ordered to be printed, though it be a month or a year afterwards, and move than a certain number of extra copies be printed. Congress must have some discretion, and you must allow the two Houses to order extra copies of documents to some extent. We cannot well say that when they order the usual number, which is one thousand four hundred and twenty, of any document to be printed, they shall never afterwards order any more; but as these matters are under our rules referred together, the usual number and the extra number, the presumption is that a member who does not bring in his motion for an extra number at the same time that the usual number is moved, stands in a bad attitude to get the favorable consideration of his proposition. Is this explanation satisfactory?

Mr. COLLAMER. But I understand the provision is, that when extra numbers are ordered, it must be by law or joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; and if the bill does not provide for requiring the order to print extra numbers to be made at the same time with the order for printing the usual number, it is only because of the limited power we have. We cannot pass a law now which we can make so permanent as to say that it shall never hereafter be repealed.

I now ask that the bill be read by sections, if Senators desire that course to be pursued, and I am willing to give an explanation of each section as it is read.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think we had better put the bill on its passage at once, for it is one of those measures that no one can undertake to amend without knowing all about it. I see no necessity for reading it section by section, but let us pass it at once.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I shall be glad to have that done.

Mr. IVERSON. I have an amendment to offer to one section.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope the Senator will be allowed to offer it.

Mr. IVERSON. I know very little about the public printing, and I do not know whether this bill is going to save anything to the public Treasury or not. I dare say it has been well digested by the Committee on Printing, and probably they are entitled to much credit for their efforts to curtail the abuse by which the country has been imposed upon. I desire to inquire of the chairman, as I see that the prices of engraving, printing, and binding are all regulated by this bill, how they compare with the prices heretofore paid?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will say to the Senator that the prices fixed here are pretty much the same prices that were fixed after a long and tedious investigation in 1852. The prices are not materially changed in any respect whatever by this bill. There is one alteration made in regard to the price of binding quartos. That has heretofore been seventy-five cents. We now reduce it to fifty cents. I believe that is the only change in regard to the prices.

Mr. IVERSON. Then I should like to understand the virtue of this change in the present law. If the prices are not reduced, how are we going to effect economy by this measure?

Mr. SLIDELL. It cuts off the large quantities.

Mr. IVERSON. How that is I do not understand. I want information.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I could, perhaps, give the information better if we were to go through the bill section by section, because it is difficult for any one to recollect all the details of such a large measure as this. The bill embraces a large number of pages, twenty-three, and it is impossible to enumerate from recollection all its provisions.

Mr. HUNTER. If my friend from Arkansas will allow me, I will suggest to him that perhaps he had better examine the bill, and to-morrow we can pass it in the morning hour, if he finds that he has accomplished by it what he thinks he has. He designs to provide that we shall print no extra copies of a document which exceeds two hundred and fifty pages, except by bill or joint resolution, so as to make that a matter of law for the purpose of restricting the quantity of printing in regard to the large documents. I have looked over the bill, and I am afraid that, except by inference, he has not accomplished his object. I would suggest to him, also, to add another limitation, that we should not only require the documents which exceed two hundred and fifty pages to be printed by the joint action of Congress, but extra numbers of all documents which exceed, say five thousand. I think if he were to do that, he would then really lessen the amount of printed matter. Most of our documents do not reach two hundred and fifty pages. I suppose the Patent Office report does not.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It is always beyond that. It is from six hundred to three thousand pages.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it would be a salutary restriction; it would improve the bill very much, if we required the assent of the two Houses to print a large number of extra documents of any kind—say where you exceed five thousand. I merely suggest this for the consideration of the chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. In reply to the Senator, I will state how the thing stands practically, because it is only in that light that I choose to treat the subject at all. All documents which exceed two hundred and fifty pages are now required by law to be bound, being deemed to be matters of sufficient value for preservation. It was the design of the committee not to restrict Congress in the power to print extra numbers of valuable documents—for instance, the annual message of the President—but to subject each branch of Congress, in some measure, to the control of the entire law-making power, in order that one House should not use its contingent fund for this purpose, in violation, as some conceive, of the Constitution of the United States. The Senator from Virginia suggests that in cases where the extra numbers go beyond five thousand, the assent of the law-making power should also be required. His suggestion of course relates only to documents within two hundred and fifty pages, documents that are not bound, consequently documents which are not accompanied by illustrations and engravings, and which cost very little comparatively.

Mr. HUNTER. How about obituary addresses?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Obituary addresses are smaller, and the committee did not think it proper to touch these little minor matters, but preferred to leave them to the sense, the discretion, and the virtue of Congress. The committee anticipated that the most serious difficulty in the way of the passage of this bill would be to get the party of the Administration to consent that we should throw it in the power of both branches of Congress to restrict the publication of the annual executive documents. I am glad to see that no objection of that kind exists. I am glad that there is a feeling above party considerations to promote the public service, which induces gentlemen to consent that matter proposed to be printed shall be submitted to the consideration of both branches, so far as extra numbers are concerned.

With regard to the particular suggestion which the Senator from Virginia has made, it is a point which did not occur to the committee. The proposition was not suggested to us that neither House should order over five thousand copies of any document without its being passed through as a law of the land. If the Senator will offer that amendment at the proper time, I will support it. I believe it is right. As I said before, no bill can be entirely perfect in regard to a subject so complicated, and so full of details as this; and I am prepared to adopt any good suggestion that may be made. I hope the bill will be passed to-day. I am afraid that if it be laid over we shall not get it up again, but I think we can pass it very soon; if we now go on with it.

Mr. IVERSON. I have not scrutinized this bill particularly. It may contain more merits than I think on the first blush. Do I understand that the bill provides that in regard to any document over two hundred and fifty pages, it will require the joint resolution of both Houses of Congress to publish extra numbers? Is that a provision of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. IVERSON. That will accomplish something, so far as large documents are concerned; but I apprehend it will not do any good so far as documents of less than two hundred and fifty pages are concerned. I recollect that, two sessions ago, the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] introduced a resolution which required the joint action of both Houses before any extra number of any public document should be printed. That resolution was brought forward by the Senator to correct the abuses to which the public printing had been extended, and it met with a great deal of favor at that time; but the Senator himself did not press it, and I have heard no more of it since. If this bill accomplishes that much, it is something. At any rate, it will protect the Government from the imposition of one House ordering a very large amount of public documents to be printed without the consent of the other. But I think the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia is a very good one, that this ought to apply to all public documents. I see no reason why the House of Representatives should be authorized to publish one or two hundred thousand copies of a document containing less than two hundred and fifty pages, when they would not be permitted to publish one containing three hundred.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will state the motive that influenced us in regard to that. The Senator from Georgia, I am satisfied, only desires what shall be best for the public service. As to extra copies of all documents above two hundred and fifty pages, we require that the law-making power shall make the order. That embraces both Houses and the Executive. In regard to the documents of a less number of pages than that, we have not fixed a limitation. We did not choose to fix a limitation on the smaller documents in view of the fact that a committee very frequently having a grave subject before the Senate, may desire to have some extra copies printed of a small report, as it may be termed, in comparison with other works that are printed. We did not choose to say they should not print any extra numbers at all without the consent of the law-making power.

I will give you an instance at once. In the case of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, when it was first brought forward, the Senator from Illinois made his report from the Committee on Territories. That report, I think, was some fifty or sixty pages. There were five or ten thousand extra copies of it ordered to be printed. There may at any day be a report from a committee brought forward, of which we may want five or six thousand extra copies. The cost amounts to nothing comparatively. On many subjects there may be such a report. The Printing Committee did not wish to run in conflict with the will of the Senate or House of Representatives on a mere report in regard to ordinary daily transactions of business by saying that they shall have no extra copies on matters where the cost is not material, or at least amounts to very little. That was the reason why we said the law-making power alone shall govern when the amount of the printing of any particular document exceeds the number of two hundred and fifty pages. That was the reason why we did not extend this restriction so as to embrace documents of a less size than two hundred and fifty pages. We were also led to that conclusion from the fact that two hundred and fifty pages are capable of preservation, while less than two hundred and fifty pages are not capable of preservation for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall not press this subject any further. I presume the bill of the committee will accomplish something, at any rate, to a certain extent. I desire to ask the Chair if it is in order now to move an amendment to any section of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is customary to take up bills section by section. If there be no amendment offered to the first section, an amendment will be in order to the second.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope that course will be pursued; I think it is necessary to proceed section by section, in order that the chairman may make his explanations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will do so; but gentlemen may ask for information on any point, and I shall endeavor to explain.

Mr. BIGLER. What I desire is to see a parallel between the two laws—that which is superseded and that which we propose to adopt, the points of difference as to the price and as to the guards which are interposed against the amount of printing. I think the chairman can give us that very rapidly and satisfactorily as we proceed section by section. I confess that I am not prepared to vote on this bill as a whole, as it stands now, without understanding something of its features.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Between the fifth section, which fixes the prices and the present law, there is no difference. That section is merely a codification of existing law. The only difference is, it is much cheaper to us and much harder on the Printer; because, under these regulations, we shall print a great deal less at the same prices.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia indicated that he had an amendment to offer. The Chair suggests that it would be better to have the bill read section by section.

Mr. MASON. This bill has been read through. The subject is one which I suspect very few of the Senators comprehend in the necessary details that exist; and I hardly think it would be desirable to read it again section by section. If Senators have any amendments to offer, I suppose they can offer them at once; but I am sure, to read the whole bill again, would not inform the Senate any more than they are already informed in regard to it.

Mr. HUNTER. We shall have to take a good deal on trust. I am disposed to vote for the bill as it stands. I believe the committee have done a good deal, possibly not all that could be done. That would be too much to expect; but they have accomplished some great good if they diminish the expenses as much as the chairman thinks. I dare say we are as well prepared to vote now as we shall be hereafter. I am afraid that if we lay it over, we shall not act on the subject again; and I am very anxious that the bill should pass. I would rather forego the chance of amending it, and take it as it is, than delay it. I am, for one, ready to vote for it as it stands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The course which the Chair was directing to be pursued is that which is laid down in the Manual; but he is informed that it has been usual in the Senate to receive amendments at all times to all parts of a bill. The bill is a long one, and if there be no objection, the Chair will receive the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, no matter to what section it may be.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to amend the tenth section by adding a proviso. The tenth section provides for the election of a binder, and I propose to add this proviso:

Provided, That the person so elected shall be a practical binder, and qualified in every respect to superintend and perform said binding.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Perhaps it would be more satisfactory to the Senate for me to state at once the points involved in the different sections of the bill. I have before me a written memorandum of each section. There are points here which I would rather the Senate should see. I do not want to pass anything that you do not understand and see; and if you say so, I will give you, as an instance, the first section, and I will state its substance.

The substance is, that the first section is the old law, simply amended so as to provide for making one of the clerks now allowed to the Superintendent of Printing a chief clerk, with a corresponding salary. It does not propose any additional clerical force in the office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senator from Georgia was upon the floor, offering an amendment to the tenth section. He yielded the floor to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I accede to the amendment; I think it is right.

Mr. IVERSON. I did not exactly yield the floor; but the Senator from Arkansas took it from me.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I beg your pardon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs pardon also. He thought the Senator had yielded.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Arkansas, in his impetuosity, sometimes gets on the floor, and it is impossible to stop him.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Read the amendment again; I think I approve it.

Mr. IVERSON. It is simply to add to the tenth section:

Provided, That the person so elected shall be a practical binder, and qualified in every respect to superintend and perform said binding.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I certainly have no objection to that. I believe it is already so provided in another part of the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. It says the Superintendent of Printing is to be a practical printer, and the engraver a practical engraver, but it does not provide that the binder shall be a practical binder.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I accept that amendment. I think it ought to be there, if it is not.

Mr. IVERSON. Very well. I have no other amendment to propose and no objection to the bill. I shall vote for the bill, hoping that it will accomplish what the Senator from Arkansas desires.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I have an amendment to suggest, rather than to propose, which I should be gratified to see adopted, unless some proper reasons can be shown by the honorable Senator who has, with so much labor and care prepared this bill. I do not see the propriety or the expediency of printing any document or book beyond the number that is necessary for the information of Congress. I do not see the necessity or propriety of printing extra copies either to the number of five hundred or five thousand of any book or books. The printing is designed only, and I presume legitimately, for the information of the members of the two Houses. Although the honorable Senator has said, and I doubt not correctly, that after the type is set, and preparation is made, the additional number of copies costs proportionately but very little additional money, yet I know that in the nature of things the inducements to a large number of copies would very often lead the two Houses of Congress to order the printing of what would not otherwise be printed at all; and, therefore, I submit an amendment to prevent hereafter, unless sanctioned by law, the printing any extra numbers. The amendment will come in under the eighth section, and is to insert:

But not more than the usual number of copies of any document or book shall be printed unless by authority of law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That is already a provision of this bill. We concurred in committee with the very idea which the Senator has expressed.

Mr. MASON. I understood the Senator to say, in his remarks, that the bill limited the printing, unless by authority of law, of any document, to those exceeding a certain number of pages, I think he said two hundred and fifty pages.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. By one House separately.

Mr. MASON. Precisely. Then the bill provides that there shall be no extra numbers of any document exceeding two hundred and fifty pages, unless authorized by law. The amendment I propose prohibits the printing of an extra number of any document, of any size, unless authorized by law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will say to the Senator that it is possible that one of the treaties we may have to consider, or any executive document brought before us, may exceed two hundred and fifty pages, and it would not be proper to cut off its printing for the use of the Senate. This amendment imposes a limitation more stringent than that contained in the bill. We have no question whatever that, if you cut off Senators and members from the power to print books for the purposes of distribution, and for purposes that are not legitimate to the public service so much as they have regard for their own personal popularity abroad by the distribution of documents, and the exertion of a species of public patronage in that way, there is not so much danger of excess as there is when you enable the same House that makes the order to print for its own use in legislative matters, also to have the power to print for the purposes of distribution. It is the distribution we have sought to control, as reaching the real vice that exists in the system; and we feel that when we have cut off the power of either House to order and pay out of its contingent fund for extra numbers of various works hitherto printed for publication, and like works hereafter, we have struck at the root of the evil which has involved the Government in debts of millions to make character for a few individuals outside, and more particularly for us to distribute books.

Mr. MASON. But I still understand the Senator to say that the limitation on the extra numbers to be printed is a limitation measured by the number of pages of the book. If the book is less than two hundred and fifty pages it is then competent to either House to order any number they please.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Exactly. Your colleague proposed a limitation which, I believe, is a good one, that where the size of a volume falls short of two hundred and fifty pages, an extra number shall not be ordered exceeding five thousand copies, unless by law. The committee provide that where there are two hundred and fifty pages, extra numbers shall not be printed except by law; but when the pages fall short of that, the Senator's colleague proposes that we shall not print five thousand copies without a joint resolution, or a law. I think that measure is a good one. In that respect, I concur with the Senator, but I cannot make that amendment right off.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Virginia that his amendment will not accomplish the object at all. If he will refer to the bill as it lies before him, he will find that if he wishes to accomplish what is contemplated by the amendment, he should move to strike out the proviso in page 20. The bill at page 20 provides that no extra numbers shall be printed except by authority of law—that is, by joint resolution or act of Congress, and then contains this proviso:

"That nothing herein contained shall prevent either House of Congress from ordering the printing of extra copies of any document, report, or other matter for distribution, when the number of pages do not exceed two hundred and fifty."

If the Senator desires to amend the bill in conformity with the view he suggests, the proper amendment would be to move to strike out that proviso.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The object of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] can be accomplished by amending that proviso so as to make it read:

"That nothing herein contained shall prevent either House of Congress from ordering the printing of five thousand extra copies of any report when the number of pages," &c.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have that amendment interlined in my copy, if it be deemed necessary to put it in. I hope we shall get a vote though.

Mr. MASON. I never saw this bill until it was laid on my table to-day at the very moment the Senator called it up, and I could not, therefore, determine how far the amendment which I offered would be congruous to the bill. As far as I can see it, I should agree with the Senator from Louisiana that the object would appear to be accomplished by striking out that proviso. I withdraw the amendment, therefore, and offer in lieu of it an amendment to strike out the proviso contained on the twentieth page, between lines twenty-one and twenty-five, in these words:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent either House of Congress from ordering the printing of extra copies of any document, report, or other matter for distribution when the number of pages do not exceed two hundred and fifty."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that I shall be willing to vote for that; but, after all, it is not a matter of so much consequence as the Senator from Virginia supposes. It is comparatively trifling. The expense we are at for printing extra copies arises from the great number of extra copies that are printed of books to be bound. The extra copies of unbound documents are very limited in number. It is very seldom that we do anything of the kind. They are good for nothing for distribution, and there is no disposition on the part of members to have a large number of extra copies of them. Many of the smaller documents of this description we need very much, for they are the principal documents that we use in the Senate Chamber. They get lost, and it is important to have a supply of them. The extra expense occasioned by these documents that are unbound is very trifling indeed. The difficulty is where the honorable chairman has suggested; and that is in the bound volumes. Now, by law as it exists, we bind nothing unless it exceeds in number two hundred and fifty pages; and therefore this provision is inserted: that, with regard to the bound volumes, which make all the expense, extra copies shall not be printed except by authority of law. That, I think, meets the whole difficulty. If Senators will look into it as the chairman and the other members of the Committee on Printing have, they will find that the saving to be made by striking out this proviso would hardly pay for the limitation on the necessary power of the two branches in regard to these particular documents. I think, therefore, it had better be left as it is.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not wish to have this bill fail by putting into it provisions which may embarrass its great objects; and I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia whether his object would not be accomplished by a restriction of the proviso instead of striking it out altogether. If it be stricken out you could not print extra numbers of any report, even of ten pages, or fifty pages, or one hundred and fifty or two hundred pages, except by authority of law. I will consent to modify the proviso so that it shall read:

Nothing herein contained shall prevent either House of Congress from ordering the printing of five thousand extra copies, or less, of any document or other matter, for distribution, when the number of pages do not exceed two hundred and fifty.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator assign to me a reason why Congress should print five thousand copies of any document, whatever its size, whether large or small?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will; and I will take the instance of the Dred Scott decision. I do not know that I could take one which would strike the Senator with more force within my experience here. It was the desire of one House of Congress that that small document should be printed and distributed. It was not two hundred and fifty pages. It was not required to be bound. We were anxious to distribute it, and the cost was comparatively little. It was made greater from quarters where it ought not to have been made so. The cost, intrinsically, did not amount to much. If it be made a matter of law, one House differing from the other could shut out from the public mind knowledge that might be deemed of interest on a very grave and important question.

That is the reason why, in a matter of small cost, I should say that each branch should be left to some discretion, and trusted for some virtue. That is the reason why I oppose the amendment, particularly when I know that, if both Houses are allowed this privilege, it can involve no great cost to the public Treasury, because it is impossible, in the nature of things, that any great cost can accrue in this respect. I say that a little discretion ought to be allowed; and I should not like to agree to this amendment, because it ties the hands and binds up the action of both branches of Congress, so that they may feel justified in throwing the whole bill overboard. I do not wish to lose the bill on such a small matter as this.

["Question! Question!"]

Mr. SEWARD. If there is to be a question on this bill, I am content to wait; but if there is to be further debate, I shall move to adjourn.

Mr. MASON. Let us take the question. I shall say nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Before the question is taken on striking out the proviso, I move to amend it by inserting after the word "of," in the twenty-third line of page 20, "any number not exceeding five thousand;" so as to read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent either House of Congress from ordering the printing of any number not exceeding five thousand, &c.

Mr. MASON. I prefer to strike out the whole proviso. I see no necessity for printing more than the usual number of any document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the question is taken on striking out the proviso, the question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now insist on my motion to strike out the whole proviso.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope it will not be stricken out as amended.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall be very glad to have an opportunity to examine this bill, but I will not interfere with it except that I should like to have the chairman give me an explanation of section eight. It is a very valuable section. It reads as follows:

"That when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the Printer of that House which first ordered the same."

That I understand is to avoid the expense of composition twice.

"And in all cases where the same person or the same firm shall be Printer for both Houses of Congress, and both Houses shall order the same document to be printed, composition shall be charged but once for said document."

Now what I want to ask is, whether the first provision does not cover this in all cases?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I know this section well. We had it under discussion freely, and I believe I am prepared to answer any question in regard to it. The section now reads:

"When any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the Printer of that House which first ordered the same; and in all cases where the same person or the same firm shall be Printer for both Houses of Congress, and both Houses shall order the same document to be printed, composition shall be charged but once for said document."

In 1852, when the original bill was adopted, this provision existed in the law; but subsequently, in consequence of the fact that each House elected separate Printers, provision was made—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will excuse me. He does not understand my point. I understand the object of the first provision is to return to the old law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is, to provide that, where both Houses order the same document to be printed, the expense of composition shall be charged once, and that to the House which first ordered it to be printed; but he has got a little something in here which would seem to limit that general provision, which is very valuable, and that is the words:

"Where the same person or the same firm shall be Printer for both Houses of Congress."

The rule would apply whether the same person or firm was Printer or different persons were Printers. There may be a Printer to the Senate and there may be a Printer to the House; they may be different persons; but the object of the law is to provide that, although they may be different persons or different firms, yet composition shall be charged but once, and that by the Printer who first prints the same, that is, the Printer of the House first ordering the printing. Now, I suggest that those words should be struck out, and it should read, after the word "same" in the fourth line:

And in all cases where both Houses shall order the same document to be printed, the composition shall be charged but once, &c.

I propose to strike out the words, "the same person or the same firm shall be Printer for both Houses of Congress, and;" because we ought to make no difference whether the same person or firm is Printer for both Houses.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I see no objection to what the Senator proposes. I did not see it in that light before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It might leave an implication: I therefore move to strike out, after the word "where" in the fifth line of the 8th section, the words "the same person or the same firm shall be Printer for both Houses of Congress, and;" so that the section will read:

That when any document shall be ordered to be printed by both Houses of Congress, the entire printing of such document shall be done by the Printer of that House which first ordered the same; and in all cases where both Houses shall order the same document to be printed, composition shall be charged but once for said document, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say, before I vote on this bill, that I am not quite satisfied that the prices, which are the same thing they were before, are not now too high. I have had very serious doubt on that subject; but I am not prepared, not having looked at the bill until it came up to-day, to suggest any further alterations or amendments of it. I wish to say, however, that from the examination I have made of the bill cursorily at my desk, I am satisfied that it makes very many improvements, and that it will save a great deal of money if faithfully carried out. I do not know but that it may be improved; but the Senate being disposed to pass it without allowing any further time to examine it, which I should like, I shall make no objection, but simply say that as it will do a great deal of good, in my judgment, as it stands, I am willing to vote for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendments were concurred in, and the question was stated: "Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?"

Mr. BROWN. I do not rise to oppose the engrossment of this bill. I am quite as willing that it shall be passed to-day as at any time. I suppose, from what we see around us, that it is the sense of the Senate that it shall pass; but the whole bill, in my judgment, is cast wrong. It simply reduces, without abolishing, abuses. It reduces the amount of printing, without getting clear of all that portion of it which is done ex gratia. I have held, from the beginning, that this Government has no power to print books and give them away; and hence that all your extra printing was done without principle, and in violation of the Constitution. If you can print a book worth fifty cents, and give it away to a private individual, you can, under the same power, abstract from the national Treasury one hundred or a thousand dollars in some other form, and give it away to a private individual. From my earliest entering into Congress, down to this hour, I have uniformly, persistently, and consistently warred against this whole business of printing books for gratuitous distribution. I find no warrant for it in the Constitution; but, on the other hand, I find in it a monstrous abuse. My humble voice has been raised against it, time and time again.

As has been said by an honorable Senator, you have the right to print books, reports, and documents which are necessary to the transaction of the public business; but I would go one step beyond that; I would inform the great public as to what is going on in Congress; and therefore, I would print a single volume of each one of your public documents, and send it to the keeper of each of the public archives in each of the counties in the Union, where it should belong to no particular man, but where it should belong to the great public which contributes to pay for the printing of the book. When you send it to the keeper of the archives, it belongs to the people, and one man has as much right to consult it as another, one has the same right to know what is included in its lids as another; but when you print a book and send it to a private individual, it becomes his private property. Sir, the volumes which compose the whole series of the Pacific railroad survey, could not have cost less than thirty-five dollars or forty dollars a set. By what authority does Congress vote forty dollars, or even thirty dollars, out of the national Treasury to be given to any particular man, and to be given according to the grace of a Senator or Representative, who happens to receive the book? There is no authority for it.

I say again, this abuse has been too long practiced; it is time an end should be put to it. As a member of the House of Representatives and as a member of the Senate, I have endeavored to arrest this proceeding. More than three years ago I referred a proposition to the Printing Committee, instructing them to inquire into the propriety of confining the publication of public documents to a number sufficient to furnish each of the counties and each of the public libraries with a single volume; but they reported against it, and the thing went on until we have been involved in the expenditure of millions of millions of dollars, not for the publication of the President's message and the accompanying documents, not for publishing reports from the heads of Departments and bureaus, but for the publication of other books, outside books, for gratuitous distribution. I do not mean to say the Committee on Printing are to blame. I know they are not. They have discharged their duty as best they might. The fault is with ourselves, that we urge them on to bring in reports for the publication of large numbers of these expensive but useless and valueless books. I would confine the publication to a sufficient number of books to furnish one volume to each of those who are connected with the administration of the Government and then put a single volume in each county, open to the inspection of every citizen of that county. There I would stop. I would include in this the President's message and documents, reports from the heads of Departments, bureaus, and all the public documents, so that by this means you would build up in each county of the Union a political library.

Only imagine, Mr. President, that some such policy as this had been adopted twenty years ago. Every citizen of a county would go to the county seat with a full knowledge that in the county library he would find a document to which he could refer, and inform himself upon any question that had been prominent before the public for the last twenty years. It would not have cost you one dollar where the present system of publication costs you fifty. Why, sir, the cost of publishing one of these miserable picture books would have paid for the publication of all the volumes necessary to supply every county in the Union.

While I say the committee have made a step in the right direction, have proposed a great reform, I think they have not gone to the right point. They have not done so because they have not proposed to confine the distribution of books to the public, and not to individuals. I would give to the public the volumes for which the public pay, and I would have them sent through your Secretary, and the Clerk of your House of Representatives, sever the connection of Senators and members of Congress entirely from it. I want to get clear of the burden of franking these books. It is labor which I should be glad to get clear of, as I dare say every one else here would be. Then publish one volume for each county of the Union, and require your Secretary and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to send them out under their frank, to be public property, and not private property. Then you serve the public, and do not vote millions upon millions of the public treasure away to Senators and Representatives, simply to serve their private constituents and friends. That is my idea of what ought to be done; but as I cannot get that, and as this seems to be a step in the right direction, I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope we may have a vote. I concur in a great deal of what the Senator has said, and this is a step in the right direction.

Mr. KING. The remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, it seems to me, touch this subject in the right direction for reform. The books and documents which are printed here, are printed at the public expense, and are, or ought to be, the property of the public. They should neither be appropriated by us as individuals, nor sent to particular friends in the respective districts or States. I am inclined to believe that a proposition which shall carry out the views of the Senator from Mississippi may perhaps be incorporated into this bill, though I do not know that it can.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I know the Senator desires that some good shall be done in this direction, and I will simply remark to him that the committee have studied this subject very carefully, and we know that if this provision be inserted now, we shall have no bill passed at this session, for even if we passed it here, it would not go through the other House. I will say, further, that in regard to the main point referred to by the Senator from Mississippi in his remarks, I sympathize with him, and the committee have conversed about it, and considered it. The Senator from New York, and the Senator from Mississippi, say that it should be against the law to print books for distribution. I call their attention to the fact that it is provided in this bill that they shall not be printed except by law. Is not that substantially the same thing? If you pass a law saying they should not be printed, you could repeal it, and order the printing at any time. I hope gentlemen will allow us to pass this bill now, and we can hereafter bring in a bill which will reach the disputed points. We are too late now to go into contested points. This reaches much.

Mr. KING. This bill does not provide against the distribution. It does not, therefore, provide against what I think is one of the worst evils of the present system of public printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If there is nothing to distribute, the evil is less than when there is a great deal to be distributed.

Mr. KING. The annual message of the President and the accompanying documents from the Departments contain information which should go to the public in some form, and I do not suppose that this bill, or any suggestion the Senator makes, is intended to cut off the printing of large numbers of those documents for distribution in some form.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Not at all; but to make it matter of law.

Mr. KING. They will be distributed then in the mode they are now distributed—by individual members to individual persons or to libraries as they choose; but I should be willing to extend the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi to incorporate colleges and academies, and thus throughout the whole Union these documents would be in a position where they would be accessible to everybody, and each and every person would have a right to look at them, to see them, and to use them. I am aware that there is a disposition on the part of the Senate to pass this bill, and I have no desire to interpose and prevent the accomplishment of the wish of the Senate.

The Senator from Arkansas has suggested that this subject has been before the committee, and has been considered by them, and that they have a favorable view of it. Now, if the Senator from Arkansas will say to me that he will bring in a proposition to provide for this sort of distribution, that we may have an opportunity to act upon it, and obtain the sense of the Senate—of course, I do not ask him to pledge himself to its support; but if the committee will subsequently, in some mode, report this proposition for the distribution of the documents which may be printed by law, in the manner which has been suggested in this brief debate, to the clerks' offices and public libraries, so that we may have an opportunity to pass upon it, I will waive any further suggestion or discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That is a matter which I shall move myself, if no one else does, as a separate measure; and I will try to perfect it.

Mr. KING. Very well; if we shall have a chance to act on that, I shall be satisfied.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, May 4, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. A. HARRIS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF PAPERS.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, it is necessary to have reports of committees made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the regular order of business will be carried out; but I simply wish to ask the House to allow me to get an order to have certain papers printed for the use of the House and of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of appropriation bills.

Mr. SEWARD. I will yield for that, but for nothing else. It is necessary to have reports of committees made, in order that we may have business before us at the next session of Congress; otherwise, we will have no business before us.

The papers were ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call for reports of committees.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to that. Let him take copies, and leave the original here.

Mr. SANDIDGE. The only paper he wants is a certificate issued by a local land office in the case. That is necessary for him.

Mr. LETCHER. Then let him leave a copy of it.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I have no objection to that. It was so ordered.

Mr. BLAIR, from the same committee, reported a bill to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, and asked that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. LETCHER. Is that a private bill? I understand it to be a bill of a public character.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri state whether this is a bill of a general character, or special?

Mr. BLAIR. It is intended to ascertain and settle private land claims in New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. If it is a general bill it will have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the petition of Rice M. Brown, and on the petition of Alexander Hays; which were severally laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL DEPOT ON BLYTHE ISLAND.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, a bill to amend an act authorizing the establishing of a navy depot on Blythe Island, at Brunswick, on the coast of Georgia; and for other purposes, approved January 28, 1857, and to make further appropriation to prosecute said object, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN WAKEFIELD.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Wakefield; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House; and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

V. HALL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of V. Hall, for compensation for loss of wardrobe; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

R. COATES

Mr. WINSLOW, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Dr. R. Coates; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

It was so ordered.

Also a resolution (S. No. 35) removing restrictions upon a certain grant of five sections of land to the State of Iowa; in which resolution he was instructed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was here received from the President of the United States, by J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, announcing to the House that he had approved and signed "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858."

CENTRAL AMERICAN MATTERS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have two or three reports to present from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There are two of them connected with the same subject—I mean Central American matters. They are a report on the Paulding case, and a report on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I am anxious to make some explanation of my views, and of the views of the committee, on both these matters. But, as I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] desires to call up another matter at one o'clock to-day, I ask, as a favor from the House, that when the reports are presented, their consideration may go over until to-morrow. I am not well to-day.

Mr. COBB. Postpone it four or five days.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would say to my friend that, after to-morrow, I shall necessarily be absent for two or three days.

The report terminates with the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That inasmuch as the United States can never consent that any foreign Power shall have the right to enter our territory with a view of forcibly carrying away any person who may be therein, so it becomes the duty of this Government to disavow and disclaim all right on its part to enter for the same purpose the territory of any foreign Power or State with which we are on terms of amity or friendship.

Resolved, That officers of the United States have no right to use the force under their command in the territory of any foreign State, at the instance of, or for the benefit of, such State, unless previously authorized by Congress.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the views of the President, as made known in his message to the two Houses of Congress, are in accordance with these principles, no action is necessary on the part of Congress.

Mr. RITCHIE. I desire to offer the following resolution as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee—that it may be considered at the same time with the resolutions of the majority:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and the same are hereby, presented to Commodore Hiram Paulding, and through him to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines, attached to the squadron under his command, for the capture, on the 8th of December last, at Punta Arenas, of one William Walker, and others associated with him, who were engaged in carrying on against the Government and people of Nicaragua an unlawful military enterprise, which was set on foot by the said Walker and his associates within the territory and in violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire, as I am not well to-day, and do not wish to interrupt the calling of committees during the morning hour, to ask the consent of the House that I may to-morrow, at one o'clock, make an explanation on these matters, and leave them to the action of the House. I ask it as a favor from the House, for after to-morrow I must be absent for a few days. I have personal reasons for desiring it, independent of some public ones. I ask simply that the resolutions which have been read, and those in regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, may be postponed till one o'clock to-morrow, and be printed.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I think there will be no objection, with the understanding that this matter shall be in order for remarks from other gentlemen as well as from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is only to be set down as a special order for some day when the gentleman will be heard on the subject. I have no objection to hear the gentleman from North Carolina; indeed, I desire to hear him; and I presume the House is willing to hear him; but I do not want this matter to be so arranged as that the report shall come into the House with the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina upon it, and nothing more—no further action on the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that if the consideration of the report be postponed to a future day, when the gentleman from North Carolina shall have been heard upon it, the report will be before the House, and unless the House choose to cut off debate other gentlemen can be heard.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. With that understanding, I will withdraw any objection to the gentleman being heard.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not rise to object to the accommodation of the gentleman from North Carolina, but I am anxious to understand what the nature of the postponement is. Do I understand that this is to be made a special order?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all. I merely ask that instead of making my remarks to-day, the House will indulge me in doing so to-morrow.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand that when the committees are again called for reports, during the morning hour, the gentleman from North Carolina shall have the privilege of being heard on this question?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not desire to interfere with the reports of committees. I only ask as a matter of favor to let this matter go over to the time I indicate.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. And within the morning hour?

Mr. CLINGMAN. No; after it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Will the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand in what condition these papers are to be considered?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That is what I want to know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina cannot have two reports under consideration at the same time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Only by general consent. Of course the House will act upon them separately; but, as they relate to the same subject-matter, I ask that by general consent they may go over till to-morrow. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to inquire whether, if they go over till to-morrow, an amendment to the resolution will be in order?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Of course it will. The whole subject will be open for consideration.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to any special order. I have no objection to the gentleman from North Carolina being heard, but I object to special orders.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It would not be a special order.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to say that I do not approve the resolutions reported by the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of that committee; nor do I approve of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have, however, drawn up a resolution which I shall offer as a substitute for both. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the conduct of Commodore Paulding, in capturing General William Walker and his men at Punta

Arenas, in Nicaragua, was without the authority of law, and meets the condemnation of this House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The point I wish to make—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand that; but I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me a moment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have but a word to say. I desire to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that I desire that such a disposition shall be made of this report that we can discuss it. I want to speak upon it, and it is my purpose to do so; and I will say to the gentleman, that I have been desirous to speak on the subject for three months.

Mr. CLINGMAN. So have I.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. There is a resolution by which we can have night sessions in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. There is no such resolution. It did not pass.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It did not pass?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. No, sir; it was withdrawn.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This discussion might go over until to-morrow—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. I do not understand—and I hope the Chair will correct me if I am in error—that there is anything now before the House. I understand that the gentleman from North Carolina did not offer to put this question now before the House upon its passage, but simply requested the House to allow him the privilege, by unanimous consent, to say to-morrow what he would have to say to-day. I do not object to that. If the gentleman asks that, then, if I am not mistaken, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] cannot discuss this question in its present condition. I am willing that this question should be resumed to suit the gentleman from North Carolina, provided he confines himself to-morrow to the morning hour; for at the end of the morning hour of each and every day I hope the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If debate on this subject can be confined to the morning hour, I have no objection to its postponement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman's question of order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is that there is nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that there are two reports before the House for consideration, which the House must dispose of either by a motion to postpone, or by action upon them in some way.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I merely wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that I have no objection to his being heard upon this subject to-morrow at one o'clock, but I want the matter so arranged that the rest of us who desire to be heard upon it, may be heard in continuation at the same time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire exactly what my friend wishes. Ordinarily I would have gone on and made my statement to-day. I have given my reasons for desiring delay. I hope the gentleman over the way [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] will remember that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have not occupied five minutes of the time of the House this session. I have spoken on no question. The question before us is a very important one, and I hope the gentleman will allow the gentleman from Alabama and others, if they desire, to get in their reports in the morning. I have personal reasons for desiring to take the floor to-morrow morning. My proposition is to postpone the consideration of these two reports until the time I have mentioned; and whenever I have made the statement I desire, the gentleman from Kentucky or any other gentleman can take the floor, as the resolutions will be before the House for all purposes. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, considering that the business of his committee has heretofore mainly occupied the attention of the House, will waive his objection and grant my request. If I had not a particular reason for my request, I would not make it to the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. My whole object is to confine the debate to the morning hour, in order that public business may be resumed at that time. I do not want to interpose any objection to the gentleman from North Carolina taking any day for discussion that may suit his convenience, if he will only confine the debate to the morning hour, and if it is not disposed of in that time, then that he shall take the morning hour of the next day, and so on from day to day until it is disposed of.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I know the gentleman's courtesy is extreme, and I am obliged to him for it; but it does seem to me that he is the last man upon this floor to make objection to that time, since his committee has mainly occupied the time of the House heretofore. I think it no special magnanimity upon their part to concede this request.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The debate upon the appropriation bills has all been on the subject of Kansas.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I know it; but still, the bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means have been under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] cannot be entertained until the motion to postpone is disposed of.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to all further debate. We have had enough of it.

Mr. REAGAN. Will it be in order to move to lay this subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I make that motion.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Is it in order to move to postpone until a particular day?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the motion to lay upon the table takes precedence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask to have the resolution reported.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to have all the resolutions reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution accompanying the second report. It has not been read.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Whereas, the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, designated as the Clayton Bulwer treaty, is, under the interpretation placed upon it by Great Britain, a surrender of the rights of this country, and upon the American construction, an entangling alliance, without mutuality, either in its benefits or restrictions, and has hitherto been productive only of misunderstandings and controversies between the two Governments: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to take such steps as may be, in his judgment, best calculated to effect a speedy abrogation of such treaty.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw my motion to lay that resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that it is impossible for the two reports to be considered together, so far as voting upon them is concerned, though they may be discussed together.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then take up the first resolution reported and have that disposed of first, if there is objection to their being considered together.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to lay the first resolution and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered a substitute, and the gentleman from Mississippi gave notice that he would offer a substitute.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw the last report until the first one is decided upon.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to offer a resolution, as a substitute, now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the second proposition will be postponed.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Can the report be withdrawn after the motion has been made to lay upon the table?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I sent them to the Clerk's table together, and the Clerk read the wrong one first, by mistake. I intended that the second should be presented first.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I object to its going over until to-morrow. The consequence will be that the morning hour will be consumed by the gentleman from North Carolina, and nobody else will have a chance to say a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion, after the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the second one was intended to be presented first, and that the gentleman is entitled to withdraw it; otherwise he would hold that the motion to lay upon the table would prevent its withdrawal.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Did the gentleman from Texas make the motion to lay upon the table?

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I withdraw my objection. I was laboring under a mistake.

The SPEAKER. The resolution relative to the Clayton and Bulwer treaty is before the House.

Mr. RITCHIE. That resolution did not meet with the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I hope that it will be postponed, and at the proper time I desire to be heard in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it competent to object to its going over until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the gentleman to make the motion to postpone.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My motion is to recommit and postpone.

The SPEAKER. That is not the motion the Chair entertained.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I make the motion to postpone simply.

Mr. PHELPS. I suggest that it be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It will not answer my purpose, because there is an important matter of private business which will compel my absence from here at the end of the week.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I can suggest a mode by which this can be settled—let it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the gentleman can make his speech there.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I may not get the floor. I move to recommit and postpone until to-morrow.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to lay the subject upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Buffinton, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Cragin, Darnell, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Farnsworth, Giddings, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Nichols, Pike, Seward, Judson W. Sherman, William Stewart, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, and Whitley—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Adair, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Conins, Cox, Burton Craigie, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewart, Dowdell, Barfee, Edmundson, Eustis, Faulkner, Foley, Gattrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leidy, Letcher, McKilbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Milson, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Otis, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Reedy, Rangan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandiego, Savage, Seales, Scott, John Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stephens, Tripp, Underwood, Walton, Cadwallader C. Washburn, Watkins, White, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—110.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. PENDLETON stated that his colleague [Mr. GROESBECK] was detained at his house by severe indisposition.

Mr. SHORTER stated that he had paired off with Mr. BRARROUGHS on political questions; and if he had not paired off, he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. BILLINGHURST said: Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to vote. When my name was called I was absent, attending the session of one of the committees of the House, with the permission of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it has been customary to allow a member to vote under the circumstances.

Mr. BILLINGHURST's vote was received.
Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not. There are two or three minutes left.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I call for the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That will cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I am prepared to vote on the question now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I will withdraw it if the gentleman wishes to speak now. I want the resolution acted on now. If the question be opened to general debate we will have to rescind the resolution for adjournment on the 7th of June next. I hope the gentleman will make his remarks now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question. I want to say something on it.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I will withdraw it to let the gentleman be heard.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I only ask an opportunity to be heard as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will make a motion to recommit, and then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] submit his motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, this matter will come up to-morrow in order, and the gentleman can have the floor to make his speech.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to that; but I thought the other motion was as acceptable to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The reason why I prefer the motion I suggest is this: if the question be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow, the morning hour will be consumed, and then the gentleman from North Carolina will take another hour in which to make his speech on this report; and the result will be that it will be two o'clock and after before we get into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We have gone into committee every day, and I do not think that my request is unreasonable.

The question was taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have another report to make from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

PARAGUAY.

Mr. RITCHIE. I would like to make some reports from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that they may be printed. I do not propose any action now. I ask unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. RITCHIE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution on the Paraguay difficulty; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF MAINE AND MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. RITCHIE, from the same committee, reported a bill in relation to the claim of Maine and Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The House then proceeded to the business upon the Speaker's table.

EXPENSES IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, asking an appropriation to reimburse John W. Geary, late Governor of Kansas, a balance due him for disbursements in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House reports from the Court of Claims, and stated that the adverse reports would, according to the rules, be placed on the Calendar, and the bills would be considered as read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

The next business in order was a resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

The House sent the resolution back to the Senate with an amendment. The Senate agreed to the amendment of the House with the following amendments:

Strike out the word "seventeenth," and insert in lieu thereof "sixteenth," so that the amendment would read, "except as to any case pending and undetermined before any court of inquiry under the act of 16th January, 1857."

And add as follows:

And excepting, also, the case of any officer who was absent from the country at the time of the passage of said act, and had not returned previous to the 16th of January, 1858, and any such officer shall be entitled to all the privileges conferred by said act: Provided, That he applies for the benefit thereof any time within sixty days after his return.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

An act (S. No. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union was then taken up and read a first and second time.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to amend the bill by striking out "two" and inserting "three," so as to give Minnesota three members in this House instead of two. I also move to strike out all after the word "Congress" in the second line of the second section, and to insert, in lieu thereof, the words:

Until a census be taken; and after that to as many as the State may be entitled to under the general apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States.

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman will insert in his amendment that the members of Congress shall be elected by single districts. I presume there will be no objection to that. The constitution of Minnesota does not provide for districting the State.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I should object to that amendment, as the election has been held and the members elect were elected by general ticket.

Mr. GARNETT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia to permit me to offer an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will do so.
Mr. GARNETT. I move to strike out "two," and insert "one," so as to give Minnesota only one Representative upon this floor; and, if I can get an opportunity hereafter, I shall briefly give my reasons for offering the amendment.

Mr. KINGSBURY. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not want to take up the time of the House myself; but I promised to yield to the Delegate from Minnesota.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. The chairman of the Committee on Territories permits me to put a question to him. I desire to know at what time a census was taken in Minnesota, and what was the amount of population?

Mr. KINGSBURY. Allow me to answer the question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand that the census has not been completed; but the Delegate from Minnesota desires the ear of the House upon that point; and I will yield to him.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia as retaining the floor while the Delegate from Minnesota speaks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object to it.

The SPEAKER. Then it cannot be done.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman from Georgia to allow me to offer my amendment, that the House may vote upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There are two amendments already pending.

Mr. BRANCH. Is the motion to strike out and insert divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Georgia as surrendering the floor?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota cannot occupy the floor during the time of the gentleman from Georgia, if it be objected to; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] objects to it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Is it in order to make a motion to take the whole subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Georgia was not occupying the floor, and the gentleman should be recognized, it would be in order for him to make the motion.

Mr. EUSTIS. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to have the amendments read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand the position of the gentleman from Georgia, and whether he occupies the floor or not?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House myself in the discussion of this bill, and I do not know that it is the desire of a majority of the House that it shall be discussed. I would be glad to yield to the Delegate from Minnesota; but, in order to test the sense of the House whether they are ready to vote upon the bill, I move the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. We will vote it down.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If you vote it down, then the bill will be open to debate.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I trust the previous question will not be sustained. I gave notice of a substitute which I intended to offer, and I desire to have an opportunity of offering it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask for tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and AVERY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 81.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. KINGSBURY. I move an amendment, to strike out "two" and insert "three," so that Minnesota shall be entitled to three members of this House.

The SPEAKER. That amendment is already pending.

Mr. KINGSBURY. Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to submit to the House upon the question of population; and, in order that I may confine myself strictly to the statistics of this subject, I have chosen this mode of presenting them:

It will be recollected by every gentleman who was a member of the last House of Representatives, that in the enabling act for Minnesota, passed at a late day of the session, there was a stipulation providing for the taking of a census, at as early a period after the acceptance of the enabling act by the constitutional convention as possible. This was, undoubtedly, well, so far as it extended; but, in order to accomplish this result in a Territory whose population is distributed over an area of ninety thousand square miles—in a latitude of extreme severity—at a season of the year when the streams were swollen to an impassable extent, and the swamps and morasses full, required an amount of means which the marshal was unable to supply his deputies with—a sufficient amount not having been furnished by the Interior Department, in the absence of an appropriation for that purpose; hence the delay and impossibility of taking such enumeration. As fast as deputies could be found willing to undertake a task involving so much labor, at so limited a compensation as the law provides, they have been appointed. Quite a number, however, threw up their commissions, and refused to proceed without pecuniary compensation received in advance. And one at least, finding that he must wait until the Department should receive all the returns before auditing the accounts, destroyed the records. The marshal has, from time to time, inclosed such returns as he finds properly made out, to the Secretary of the Interior. And I find that, within the last few days, a final report has been forwarded, embracing nearly all the State, together with a clear and succinct statement of the difficulties attendant upon the taking of this census, giving something over one hundred and fifty thousand people—exclusive of mixed bloods and Indians who have adopted the habits and customs of civilization—in the limits of the proposed State. With these few facts to predicate an opinion upon my own convictions are that the State possesses sufficient population, in addition to what has been returned, to more than entitle us to two members—if, indeed, we have not enough to warrant the admission of three, in view of the heavy accessions by emigration constantly pouring in through the various channels leading toward our State since the taking of the census.

I am well aware that representation is based upon population only; but in order to satisfy gentlemen that Minnesota does possess as large a constituency as we claim for her, I will cite them to the number of votes polled at the October election, and then institute a fair proportion predicated upon the statistics of other agricultural States, by which I shall arrive at the probable population at present within the limits of the State of Minnesota. I have taken the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa, upon which to base my calculation, and find that, by a reference to the census returns of 1850, and the number of votes in each of those States, the ratio of population is to the voter as six to one. I think this a fair calculation upon which to estimate the number of inhabitants in Minnesota. This basis will give Minnesota an aggregate population of two hundred and forty thousand, beyond the amount sufficient to warrant you in admitting three members to seats upon this floor. I will also cite the House to another, and, I think, a very important fact, in proof of the justice of granting us three members to seats on this floor. I find that we have cast four thousand more votes than Iowa cast when she was allowed two members in this body; seven thousand more than Arkansas gave when she was allowed two members of the House; twice as many as Rhode Island had when she was allowed two members; and within three thousand five hundred of the number that Louisiana cast when she was allowed four members to this House; and this all occurred, be it remembered, since the ratio of representation was the same as it now is.

In viewing this question in an economical point of view, we shall find that Minnesota is justly entitled to consideration at the hands of Congress; and in order to fully demonstrate the fact, I will call the attention of the House briefly to the following record as a matter of historical fact, taken in connection with, and placed in juxtaposition to, that of her troublesome sister, Kansas.

By a reference to the returns, as they appear in the office of the Interior, I find that the total amount of revenue derived from the sale of public lands in Minnesota, up to December 31, 1855, was about one million and a half dollars. Since that time, the sales have largely increased, and the aggregate amount of revenue since the organization of the Territory, falls little short of six million dollars. This estimate includes land warrants located, and amounts received from the sale of reservations within the present State limits. It will be borne in mind that these locations and sales were made without the adventitious aid of "emigrant associations," based upon philanthropic principles.

It will be perceived, then, that the Federal Government has been in the receipt of a large revenue from the proposed State. Let us ascertain what amount has been expended by the Government to maintain her territorial organization, and for purposes of improvement, within her limits, since that time. The aggregate expense to the Federal Government, during the entire minority of Minnesota for all purposes, is $727,000; less than one eighth of what she has received.

Again, to illustrate the fidelity and strict adherence to law, shown by the people of Minnesota, I wish, particularly, to cite gentlemen to the fact, that it has never cost the Government one cent to preserve order, and defend the people residing on the frontiers from the murderous assaults of hostile Indians, at a time when thousands of troops were stationed in the heart of Kansas, at an enormous cost to the Government, to carry out the law and prevent our own people from shooting down one another. Kansas comes to you burdened with an enormous expense of blood and treasure, and bearing the infamy of opposition to the laws of the land, while Minnesota has complied with all the requisitions of the law. She has ever been loyal to the Constitution of the United States, and strictly conformed to its teachings without the necessity of armed interference by the military powers of our country.

And it can scarcely be denied that the Congress of the United States, during its last session, entered into a contract with the people of Minnesota, by which, after a full compliance by her citizens with the terms of that contract, Minnesota was to be admitted into the Union. Has Minnesota complied with those terms? I contend that she has, in every particular. First, by her delegates in convention—and second, by the almost unanimous voice of her citizens. Minnesota has maintained her good faith; she asks you to do the same. Her citizens are too proud to supplicate, too loyal to rebel, and time must soon determine the extent of their forbearance.

I hope that our three members may be allowed seats upon this floor, in accordance with the honestly expressed conviction of a law-abiding people.

Mr. PARROTT. In the gentleman's speech occurs this expression:

"Again, to illustrate the fidelity and strict adherence to law shown by the people of Minnesota, I wish, particularly, to cite gentlemen to the fact, that it has never cost the Government one cent to preserve order, and defend the people residing on the frontiers from the murderous assaults of hostile Indians, at a time when thousands of troops were stationed in the heart of Kansas, at an enormous cost to the Government, to carry out the law and prevent our own people from shooting down one another. Kansas comes to you burdened with an enormous expense of blood and treasure, and bearing the infamy of opposition to the laws of the land, while Minnesota has complied with all the requisitions of the law."

I would like to ask the gentleman on what basis this unwarrantable charge against Kansas is made?

Mr. KINGSBURY. I might base it upon every speech made here since the 9th of December last.

Mr. PARROTT. The charge is untrue, and I do not think that the expression has occurred in any other speech upon this floor. If that be the best reason which the gentleman has to make that remark, good taste would suggest, I think, the propriety of leaving it unsaid.

Mr. KINGSBURY. It is based upon facts before the country.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I offer the following substitute:

Whereas, an act was passed February 26, 1857, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" and whereas, delegates of the people did, on the 29th day of August, A. D. 1857, frame a constitution which does not conform with the Constitution and laws of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Minnesota shall be one of the United States of America, and shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, after a full compliance with the following fundamental condition precedent, to wit: That the constitution framed (at Saint Paul, in the Territory of Minnesota,) on the 29th day of August, A. D. 1857, shall be submitted to a convention of the people of the said Territory of Minnesota, to be composed of the number of delegates and to be apportioned and elected in the mode and manner prescribed by the act of February 26, 1857, said election to be held on the first Monday of August next, and said delegates to assemble at the Hall of the House of Representatives at the capital of said Territory on the first Monday of September next, at twelve o'clock, m.; and said convention shall conform said constitution to the Constitution and laws of the United States, or, at its discretion, shall frame a new constitution in conformity with the Federal Constitution; and said convention shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, be subject to the same qualifications, and the same propositions are hereby offered for its free acceptance or rejection, as are prescribed by said act; and the action of said convention shall be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That after said condition is complied with, the said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress, to be elected in single districts, to be prescribed by the convention.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the admission of Minnesota under the constitution that is presented here, because she has not complied with the enabling act of Congress, and because her constitution does not, in my opinion, conform to the Constitution and laws of the United States. I know that in opposing the admission of a free State—a State where slavery cannot exist—I run counter to the feelings of many of those with whom I ordinarily act; but I intend to place my opposition to this bill upon other grounds than those involved in sectional questions.

The act which authorized the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a State government, prescribes three distinct and separate conditions. The first is, that a convention of a fixed number of delegates shall be elected by the people. The second is, that the constitution to be framed by that convention shall conform to the Constitution and laws of the United States. The third is, that this constitution shall be submitted to a vote of the people, and shall be approved by them: In my opinion, two of these conditions have not been complied with. No such convention as is contemplated by the enabling act ever sat in the Territory of Minnesota. The law prescribes the number of that convention to be seventy-eight, or twice the number of Representatives in the Territorial Legislature. Instead of electing seventy-eight they elected one hundred and eight; instead of complying with the law, as the Delegate of the Territory boasts they did, they have violated the law by giving it a construction which it does not bear, and which no intelligent lawyer would give it.

Nor, sir, did the delegates thus elected assemble in convention. Unless you can call one mob of fifty-four men arrayed against another mob of fifty-nine men, some of whom were not elected at all, meeting in separate bodies, and denying each other's authority, a legal convention of seventy-eight members, they never had a convention in Minnesota. We know that two separate bodies met, one in the Hall of the House, and the other in the Council Chamber of the Territory. It was not a convention of the people. On the contrary, it was a spectacle not provided for by Congress, or contemplated by the people, and if sanctioned by Congress, will greatly discredit our republican institutions. Instead of a legal convention, committees of conference of two illegal bodies got up a scheme which they call a constitution, and submit it for our consideration.

But, sir, I do not intend to dwell upon this topic. It is apparent that Minnesota, in the election of delegates, followed the same example that had been set in other Territories. I have no official evidence of the facts to present to the House, but we know that the newspapers of both the political parties teemed with allegations of fraud. I have no doubt, though I cannot base it upon any official statement, that there was great fraud in the election of some of the delegates. I did hope that when Minnesota, a growing free Territory, in which there was no dispute as to the character of their institutions, should apply for admission as one of the sisterhood of States, she would come here orderly, with decency, and with propriety; that her convention would pursue the course marked out by the law, frame a constitution, submit it to the people for their approval or rejection, and then, with their approval, submit it here for our sanction. Instead of that they have elected the wrong number of delegates. They have connected in disgraceful association the name of Pembina with Oxford, Shawnee, and Kickapoo. Uncivilized Indians were arrayed at the polls instead of armed and organized invaders. Then, instead of meeting in convention, the delegates met in hostile bodies, and by committees of conference framed a constitution.

But, I might be willing to overlook this. I might be willing to overlook the mere irregularities of the convention itself—especially as the people of Minnesota have adopted the work of that convention—but that this constitution does not conform to the Constitution and laws of the United States. The allegations of the Delegate from Minnesota, which were read from the Clerk's desk, are not sustained by the facts. She has been far from showing her fidelity or adherence to law. She has permitted her struggling partisans of the Democratic party to trample upon the laws. The constitution framed by these two badly-organized mobs, violates the Constitution of the United States and the acts of Congress.

Mr. KINGSBURY. In what particulars?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will point them out. I have examined this constitution carefully. I find that section one, of article four, of the constitution, provides that "the Legislature of the State shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, which shall meet at the seat of government of the State, at such times as shall be prescribed by law." I have carefully examined the remaining clauses, and find no limitation to the duration of the time for which the Representatives hold office. At first, I supposed the omission was accidental, and that the convention, in the hurry of their miserable strife, did not examine the matter, and that the limitation of time was overlooked; but recent events have convinced me that this was a predetermined plan. The first Legislature, elected without limitation, under this constitution, has assumed the functions of a State government; and so far, have made no provision for the election of their successors; and, sir, I believe they will retain their power until they fill the vacancy in the Senate of the United States for the short term; and as much longer as their reckless temerity will allow them.

It is true that I find in a subsequent section a declaration that the members of the Council of the next Legislative Assembly shall be elected every two years. But that does not apply to the members of the present Legislature, nor to the members of the House of Representatives of any future Legislature. So that here there is either a palpable blunder arising from the mode and manner in which the constitution was framed, or else there was a predetermined arrangement by which those who might succeed in the first election could maintain their power in all time to come.

There is another provision which, in my judgment, though it does not violate the Constitution of the United States, does not accord with its spirit. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress may pass laws for the naturalization of foreigners. Congress has declared that no person of foreign birth, born without the limits of the United States, shall be a citizen unless he shall have lived here for five years.

I wish it distinctly understood that I am not in favor of the extension of the period of naturalization. I differ with many upon that subject. I believe that the founders of the Government, in the early history of our country, fixed the true time, and that five years is a reasonable probation for every man who comes from a foreign Government, before he shall become a citizen of the United States, and have the right to vote. I have never conversed with an intelligent foreigner who complained of this reasonable probation. I am not in favor of changing the time, but I believe the spirit of our laws and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States require that no man shall exercise the right of citizenship until he has been here five years. The constitution of Minnesota provides, in article seven, section one, subdivision two, that one class of voters shall be "white persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intention to become citizens." Now, this prescribes no term of residence to men who come here from Germany, from Russia, from Austria, from Italy, or from any other foreign country—men who may not know even the language in which their ballots are printed, and may know nothing of our Constitution and laws. They are not required to undergo a reasonable period of probation, but they may go up to the ballot-box and vote within ten days after they arrive in the new State. I know that other new States have adopted similar provisions, but I think the principle is wrong. I think the Congress of the United States fixed the true rule in the Oregon bill, and I am sorry it was not put into the Minnesota bill.

And here I trust I may count on the support of my Democratic friends; for it seems that the people of Kansas, in framing the Leavenworth constitution, have followed the example of the people of Minnesota; and I see that the Union newspaper of the date of April 18, thus comments upon it:

"Between a constitution which confers only upon citizens of the United States the elective franchise and eligibility to office, and a constitution which admits negroes, mixed breeds, and incomers from all quarters of the earth, chattering all the tongues of Babel, to these privileges, the founders of our institutions would have made a very prompt decision."

Now, the constitution of Minnesota admits all foreigners to vote in ten days after they have landed in the State of Minnesota; but the Union and its followers will be as quiet as a lamb over "the chattering tongues of Babel."

Mr. GROW. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to another provision of the constitution. The first section of the article from which the gentleman quoted, provides, that the very class to which he referred must have resided one year in the United States, four months in the State, and ten days in the election district in which he proposes to vote.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman is correct as to all subsequent elections, but I am speaking of the vote upon the constitution, and in the first election of members of Congress, under the constitution. The seventeenth section of the schedule is as follows:

"Upon the day so designated as aforesaid, every free white male inhabitant over the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided within the limits of the State for ten days previous to the day of said election, may vote for all officers to be elected under this constitution at such election, and also for or against the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he voted for the enabling act for Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I do not know what that has to do with the question.

Mr. JENKINS. I will inform you if you will give me the opportunity.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I remember very well—the gentleman from Virginia does not, for he was not a member of the last Congress—that the Minnesota bill came into the House from the Senate, and that many of us on this side of the House, myself among others, endeavored to get that bill altered in the very particular to which the gentleman alludes. We could not do it, as it was put through under the operation of the previous question, as almost everything else here is, and we had to vote for it without amendment. If I could have inserted the provisions of the Oregon bill on that subject into the Minnesota bill, I certainly should have done so; and I did all in my power to have it done.

I desire to call the attention of the House to a radical objection I have to this constitution. Section six of the schedule provides that "the first session of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota shall commence on the first Monday of December next, and shall be held at the capitol in the city of St. Paul." The constitution goes on to provide for a complete State organization before Congress could, by any possibility, act upon her application. Thus the embryo State of Minnesota, carrying out the threat of the Delegate here, in his published remarks, has, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the law of Congress, organized a State government anterior to the presentation of her application and her constitution to either House of Congress.

Mr. KINGSBURY. In accordance with the contract made by Congress itself.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have always supposed that the Constitution of the United States was the supreme law. That Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to admit new States; and I know of no other power to do that. I cannot conceive the idea of there being a State, unless Congress has admitted it as a State. The Constitution confers upon Congress, and upon Congress only, that power. We have not exercised that power. We could not have exercised it till after the time fixed by this constitution for the overthrow of the territorial authorities by the organization of a State government. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have indulged our Territories a good deal. We have overlooked a great many informalities and irregularities. But, sir, when this young sister of ours sets up her power above and beyond the power of the Constitution of the United States, I desire that Congress shall check her a little, and hold her in check.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Where does the honorable gentleman find the evidence that a State government in Minnesota has gone into operation, superseding the territorial government created by her organic law?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I find in the constitution, page 20, section six, a provision that the first session of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota shall commence on the first Wednesday in December next, and shall be held at the capitol in the city of St. Paul. This was last December, and five days before Congress met.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman also state that the Legislature has elected Senators, who are now here?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Are we at liberty to take for granted the various allegations on the subject?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am speaking of what I find in the constitution itself. If the gentleman will look at the paper before him he will find, that under the sixth section of the schedule there is a provision by which the people of Minnesota organized a State government on the Wednesday before we met here in Congress.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Without resistance from the territorial officers?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Without resistance from the territorial officers; and indeed they have aided in this successful overthrow of our authority.

Well, sir, this convention, or rather these two mobs, have organized a State government, and have not even asked our consent. They have exercised legislative powers, and their Legislature has proceeded to elect their Senators. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Delegate from Minnesota to one very curious feature in that constitution, although he says they have been so regular.

The twenty-sixth section is as follows:

"Members of the Senate of the United States from this State shall be elected by the two Houses of the Legislature, in joint convention, at such time and in such manner as may be provided by law."

Now here there is one established fact, that under the constitution of Minnesota these Senators cannot be elected until some provision is made by law.

Section eleven is:

"Every bill which shall have passed the Senate and House of Representatives, in conformity to the rules of each House, and the joint rules of the two Houses, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor of the State."

Consequently the Senators cannot be elected until a law is passed; and a law cannot be passed until it is presented to the Governor for his signature.

Now read the seventh section. It is:

"The term of each of the executive officers named in this article shall commence upon taking the oath of office after the State shall be admitted by Congress into the Union, and continue until the first Monday in January, 1880, except the auditor, who shall continue in office until the first Monday in January, 1881, and until their successors shall have been duly elected and qualified."

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is this singular state of affairs: the constitution provides that no Senator shall be elected except in pursuance of law to be passed, and provides that no bill shall be a law until it is presented to the Governor for his signature; and then provides that the Governor's term shall not commence till after Congress acts on the admission of the State; and yet here are Senators from Minnesota claiming their seats, while we are acting upon the application for admission.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand that the constitution of Minnesota provides that no act shall be considered a law until signed by the Governor of the State?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Until presented to the Governor of the State; and it cannot be presented to him until after Congress has admitted the State.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I ask my friend how it is that this State or Territory of Minnesota has passed a law authorizing a change of their constitution, to enable the people to vote a loan of $5,000,000? I think there is a provision of the constitution providing that the State government shall not go into operation until it has been accepted by Congress. If that is so, how is it that an amendment of the constitution has been submitted to the people, and adopted by the people, authorizing the State government to make a loan?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. That is one of the curiosities of this novel attempt to organize a State out of the Union. There is no such provision as the gentleman refers to, except that I have quoted, and that has been disregarded. Some reference has been made to another provision of this constitution—section five of the schedule—which is as follows:

"All territorial officers, civil and military, now holding their offices under the authority of the United States or of the Territory of Minnesota, shall continue to hold and exercise their respective offices until they shall be superseded by the authority of the State."

This does not authorize the territorial officers to perform the duties of State officers, but of their respective territorial offices.

Now, I would like to know what right has this unorganized Territory—which has not been admitted into the Union—to say to the Federal officers, "You shall exercise your respective offices till such and such and such a time, and then you must surrender?" She has none whatever.

But I have heard it claimed by some gentlemen that this provision of the constitution of Minnesota authorized the territorial officers to perform executive acts as State officers. In other words, that the appointees of the President can act as the executive officers of the State. This would be truly a novel proceeding; but upon looking at the constitution I can find no such folly in it. Our modest young sister only declares that the officers of the national Government may hold their respective offices until Congress acts upon their application. But in spite of this modest license, I understand the Legislature of the embryo State is now exercising all the functions of a State government. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Territories can say whether that is true or not. I know they have gone to work and passed bill upon bill, and act upon act. While we are sitting here, to say whether they shall come into the Union under this constitution, they are proposing to change it! What is the change they propose? It is to allow the people of this infant State to be loaded down with a debt of $5,000,000 to aid some unorganized railroad companies of land jobbers.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this thing is being carried too far. I think that the time has come when the Congress of the United States ought to put a curb upon the Territories, and to require them to obey the law. Now, sir, I am friendly to Minnesota; I know a great many people there; I would do as much for the prosperity of her people as any other man on this floor. And, sir, I believe we would do her the highest service if we would save her from her reckless land jobbers and monopolists. Let us remand this constitution to her. Let her institute her organic law properly, and then we can welcome her into the Union. I want to see the marriage bans not only receive the assent and sanction of her people, but be celebrated according to the forms of law. I want to have her come legally, and in due form. I do not want any more runaway Scotch marriages. I do not want this infant sister of ours to celebrate her nuptials with fraud, illegality, and improvidence. And, above all, I do not wish to see her set up her authority against the power of the nation or assume it until Congress has exercised its constitutional power. Until then, all her acts and proceedings are simply void, and will only result in involving her people in wasteful litigation.

Upon this point I desire to call the attention of the House to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and gentlemen on the other side who profess so much respect for the decision of this court, will pay some attention to it. It has been said by a gentleman from my own State in the other wing of the Capitol, that Minnesota is a State out of the Union. That, if we do not admit her into the Union now, she is a State, but not of the Union; and her Delegate says that if we do not admit her, endurance will cease to be a virtue and she will come in anyhow, or remain a State out of the Union. I understand the amount of the threat to be, that this young sister of ours will rebel; he says that "her citizens are too proud to supplicate, too loyal to rebel, and time must soon determine the extent of their forbearance." [Laughter.]

Well, Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States have declared that all acts and proceedings of Minnesota, before this application shall receive the sanction of Congress, are utterly null and void. Now, sir, what capitalists will take this $5,000,000 loan?

Several MEMBERS. Read the decision.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The case was that of Scott and others vs. Jones. (5 Howard's United States Reports, 379.) The facts are these: Michigan organized a State government more than a year before she was admitted into the Union. Before her admission by Congress, her Legislature, among other things, incorporated a literary society in the city of Detroit, and authorized it to acquire and hold property. Scott, one of the parties to the suit, acquired title to property under the corporation, and the question came before the Supreme Court of the United States as to whether the title was good. This depended upon the power of the State of Michigan to pass laws before her admission. The majority of the Supreme Court evaded the question by deciding on a collateral question of jurisdiction. But those who believed that the court had jurisdiction—and among others Judges Nelson and McLean—declared that:

"Michigan was an organized Territory of the United States. Its Governor, judges, and all other territorial officers were in the discharge of their various functions. The sovereignty of the Union extended to it. Under these circumstances, the people of Michigan assembled by delegates in convention and adopted a constitution, and under it elected members of both branches of their Legislature, Governor, and judges, and organized the State government. No serious objection need be made, in my judgment, to the assemblage of the people in convention to form a constitution, although it is the more regular and customary mode to proceed under the sanction of an act of Congress. But until the State shall be admitted into the Union by an act of Congress, the territorial government remains unimpaired.

"No act of the people of a Territory, without the sanction of Congress, can change the territorial into a State government. The Constitution requires the assent of Congress for the admission of a State into the Union; and 'the United States guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government.' Hence the necessity, in admitting a State, for Congress to examine its constitution.

"The act 'to incorporate the members of the Detroit Young Men's Society,' was the exercise of sovereign power—a power totally repugnant to the sovereignty of the Union in its territorial form. Until the 25th of January, 1837, Michigan was not admitted into the Union and recognized as a State. Whatever effect this admission may have, by way of relation, on the exercise of the political powers of the State prior to that time, is not now a question. The question of jurisdiction relates to the time the act was passed, and its validity.

"This act of incorporation was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, under which the territorial government was organized. It was repugnant to the laws of Congress which formed that organization. It was an exercise of sovereignty incompatible with the sovereignty of the Union, in all its legal forms. And this act was declared by the supreme court of Michigan to be valid. I cannot conceive of a clearer case for jurisdiction."

"The two sovereignties of the State and the territorial government cannot exist at the same time within the same limits. The territorial government exists in full vigor until it is abolished by the admission of the State. There was, then, a direct and irreconcilable repugnance in the exercise of the sovereign power by the State, so long as the Federal authority was exercised in the Territory."

It is thus apparent from this decision, that, by their premature and hasty action, the politicians of Minnesota are imposing upon its people a burden of litigation.

There are other features of this constitution to which I wish to call the attention of the House. It provides for the election of members of Congress by general ticket, when the act of Congress expressly provides for the election by separate districts. Why this violation of law? Was it to allow the Pembina fraud to have more extended effect? Was it to allow the uncivilized Indians to send three members here instead of one? Whether the State is admitted or not, these members ought not to take their seats until they are elected in compliance with law. Instead of discussing whether one, or two, or three members should sit with us, we ought to discuss the authority to elect their members by general ticket; for if one is entitled to a seat, all are. How will you choose between them? By what lottery or chance shall either be rejected or selected?

And, sir, after you have settled this question, show me the constitution under which you propose to make the admission. The one I have before me, and which was duly presented to the House, and appears regularly certified by Governor Medary, is signed by but fifty-two members, or less than a quorum. This manifestly cannot be the constitution; but when I look into the Senate document, I find a constitution signed by another set of officers and fifty-nine members, but not sanctioned by Governor Medary. Thus two constitutions are presented to us, signed by different persons, and different officers, but each set claiming to be the regular legal convention of Minnesota. Sir, in the midst of such confusion and irregularity, is it not a reasonable exercise of the discretionary power of Congress in the admission of new States to refer back this whole proceeding to the people of Minnesota, and require them to conform their action to the law? Sir, this is all my substitute proposes.

Mr. KINGSBURY. The gentleman seems to forget the fact that our people have voted for ratification or rejection of the constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. So did the people of Michigan.

Mr. KINGSBURY. And it was ratified by thirty-odd thousand to five hundred against it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have not overlooked the action of the people, and am far from underrating its importance; and, without the allusion of the gentleman, the course of my argument will bring me to consider the effect of their ratification. I believe that the assent of the people to their constitution is the very life of a new State. I never would, under any circumstances, drag any people into this Union unless they had assented to their constitution; and I am astonished that the dominant party in this House ever placed themselves in that position—a position, maintained here for months, and, as a majority on that side now insist, never yielded as to Kansas. It is a plain, simple principle of republicanism, and therefore I never would have voted for the admission of Minnesota, under any constitution or under any circumstances, had not the people assented to and ratified it, however regular might have been their proceedings. Nor will I vote for the admission of any new State unless the popular approval is shown beyond question.

But, sir, I want something more than the mere assent of the people of Minnesota. I want regularity, uniformity, compliance with the act of Congress, and that the State constitution shall conform to the Constitution and laws of the United States. I want something besides the mere assent of the people. I do not admit the right of the people of Minnesota to form just such a constitution as they please, and, by assenting to it, make it the supreme law of Minnesota, unless they have first had the consent of Congress.

Mr. KINGSBURY. More than ninety-nine hundredths of the people have ratified the entire constitution upon a full submission.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Very well. I do not want the people of Minnesota to commence their State existence by violating the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. KINGSBURY. Then you want to dictate to the people of Minnesota.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. No, sir; I want to make them comply with the law. There are certain laws which prescribe forms in the marriage ceremony. There must be a license, for instance. I want Minnesota to conform to the license prescribed by Congress, and thus come into the Union in a decent, legal, and orderly manner, and not commence her existence as a State with irregularity and violations of the laws and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KINGSBURY. There certainly was not as much irregularity in Minnesota as there was in the formation of the Topeka constitution for which the gentleman voted.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman may make the most he can of that argument. I did vote for the admission of the State of Kansas under the Topeka constitution; and, as the gentleman has alluded to it, I will tell him why. It was because the people of Kansas had been deprived by force and fraud of their territorial government, and Congress had neglected to pass an enabling act. They had to submit to a most odious tyranny, or present their application for admission as a State; but they never proposed to establish a State government without the assent of Congress. And so it was in California. In that case Congress had refused to pass an enabling act, and the people were left under a military despotism, and had to choose between irregularity on the one hand and anarchy on the other. But the people of Minnesota stand in no such position, and have no excuse for such irregularity. We passed for them an enabling act, fair, just, and reasonable in all its terms and requirements. We only prescribed reasonable, fair, and just conditions, assented to by them, and yet they do not comply.

Mr. KINGSBURY. That is the "license" they acted under.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. But they violated the license; they have not conformed to the law; they have not made their constitution conform to the law. That is what I complain of.

The people of Kansas and of California were compelled to choose between despotism and irregularity; and, whenever that choice is presented to the people of any portion of the United States, they will choose irregularity. But we have given Minnesota a chance to come into the Union decently, regularly, and in order; and instead of doing that, she organized a double-headed mob, and proceeded to form a constitution which does not conform to the law, but is in direct violation of it; and now her Delegate upon this floor issues his threats and her mandates to the sovereign power of the people of the United States.

Mr. KINGSBURY. Half of that "double-headed mob" was composed of members of the party to which the gentleman belongs; and even that party cooperated with us in the formation of the constitution and assisted in its ratification.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I did not rise here to talk about parties. I know that, in saying what I am now saying, I may not say what will be approved of by my party. But, if party friends violate the law, I will rebuke and condemn them, unless they can show me a case like that of Kansas or California, where the people were forced to choose between despotism or irregularity.

Mr. KINGSBURY. The gentleman is very willing to allow Kansas to bleed; but he cannot get our people to bleed. They will not bleed. They have conformed to all the requirements of the law, although they were more severe than any ever imposed upon any people in the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. That is the very question in dispute. I claim that they have not conformed to the law, and the gentleman says they have. I do not know that a single member of the Republican party will vote with me. I simply want here to give notice "to the world and the rest of mankind" that the Congress of the United States ought to establish some just, fair, and reasonable rule, requiring the Territories not only to submit their constitutions to the people, but to come here in conformity to law.

The only other remark I desire to make is this: In my judgment, all of these irregularities in the Territory of Minnesota are to be attributed to the influence of Federal officers. Had it not been for these Federal officers there would have been no irregularity. It happens that the men who are appointed to fill territorial offices, and thus having the power to mold, or aid in molding, the institutions of infant States, are the very men who ought not to be appointed. It is your Sibleys and Medarys and Gormans who are sent there, and, to gratify their senatorial aspirations, infuse their poison among the people, and thus derange the movements of new States. They seek to control them, and then irregularity begins.

I think that it would be a happy event for the people of Minnesota if Congress could refer this constitution back to them with the simple declaration: "You shall come into the Union with all the powers of the State, but the laws must be obeyed. Come in regular form, and we will greet you with hearty good will, and clothe you with the rich dower and equal rights of a sovereign State."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to address the House on this subject; and I should not have taken the floor for that purpose now, if it had not been for the remarkable course of argument pursued by the gentleman from Ohio. I have taken hurried notes of what he said, and will reply to his positions in the order in which he presented them.

The honorable gentleman set out with the remark that it might occasion surprise in the minds of some when they should discover him opposing the admission of a free State into the Union. A moment's reflection will satisfy gentlemen that those who will come in here as Representatives upon this floor, if Minnesota be admitted into the Union, will in their political opinions be radically opposite to the gentleman from Ohio. In this I find a satisfactory solution of the remarkable anomaly of the gentleman being opposed to the admission of a free State. As Democracy and so-called Republicanism are antagonistic throughout, so it requires no intellectual finessing to comprehend why the Republican gentleman from Ohio should oppose the admission into the Union of Democratic Minnesota.

The first proposition which the gentleman lays down, and in which he supposes that he finds an argument against the admission of Minnesota, is, that the wrong number of delegates were elected to her constitutional convention. I will read the law on that point. The third section of the Minnesota enabling act is as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That on the first Monday in June next, the legal voters in each representative district then existing within the limits of the proposed State, are hereby authorized to elect two delegates for each representative to which said district may be entitled according to the apportionment for representatives to the Territorial Legislature, which election for delegates shall be held and conducted, and the returns made, in all respects in conformity with the laws of said Territory regulating the election of representatives; and the delegates so elected shall assemble at the Capitol of said Territory on the second Monday in July next, and first determine, by a vote, whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and if so, shall proceed to form a constitution, and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government, in conformity with the

It will be observed that this law is susceptible of two entirely different constructions, depending upon the signification which you attach to the word "representatives." In a narrow and constrained interpretation of the meaning of that word, it would embrace only the members of the lower branch of the Minnesota Legislature. A more enlarged and liberal construction would also include the upper branch, or Senate. This is a question of legal interpretation, upon which some difference of opinion might naturally arise. The honorable gentleman from Ohio prefers the former construction, which would have made seventy-eight the proper number of delegates to be elected to the constitutional convention. The Legislature and people of Minnesota, of all parties, placed the latter construction upon the word; and acting upon this, called a convention of one hundred and eight delegates. Now, sir, this was done in good faith. It could have been done in no other spirit. What could the people of Minnesota gain by putting this construction upon the law? Anything? No, sir; nothing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit to the candor and good sense of this House, if this argument of the gentleman from Ohio against the admission of Minnesota has any force or validity? How stands the case, sir, when plainly put, and disrobed of the sophisms which the honorable gentleman has sought to throw around it? Why, thus: Congress passes an enabling act containing such vague and loose phraseology as to admit of two constructions as to the number of delegates to be elected under it—a matter, by the way, of not the slightest importance. The people of Minnesota acted upon what they considered the proper construction, and elected their delegates; and now the gentleman from Ohio and his friends would have Congress reject their application for admission into the Union, because there might be some doubt about the hidden meaning of the law which we ourselves framed. Shall we, sir, avail ourselves of the vague phraseology of our own laws to perpetrate a great wrong upon the people of Minnesota, who acted in good faith, and placed what they believed to be the most natural and rational interpretation upon them? Shall we do this great wrong, too, for an immaterial matter—the mere number of delegates to their convention—a matter which concerns nobody but themselves? In thus availing ourselves of the vagueness of our own laws, would we not be imitating the example of the Roman tyrant, who hung his laws so high that the people could not read them, and then punished those who, through ignorance, were so unfortunate as to violate them? I trust I need say no more on this point.

But, sir, another irregularity which the honorable gentleman advances is, that that convention was organized into two separate bodies. He designates them as a mob. A mob! It is a strange state of things when a "Topekaité" denounces a mob. I thought such language was reserved for the Democratic side of the House. I do not think that any man who acted with the Republican party during this Kansas excitement, any who during that excitement urged every conceivable argument to override law and order in favor of mobs, has the right here and now to make that objection. He has no right to apply the term "mob" to a legally-elected body of delegates for the Territory of Minnesota. I say that, in no proper sense, can that convention, or the two bodies composing it, if you will, be characterized as mobs. The delegates were fairly elected. They constituted a legal convention. I do not care if they did separate into two bodies. I do not care if they retained a separate organization throughout. They finally agreed upon the same instrument as the organic law of the future State of Minnesota. It is not, indeed, the usual method for a convention to organize itself into two separate bodies. But should a convention do so, yet finally concur in the same action, that concurrence must be considered as covering such irregularity.

But, sir, I go further than that, and I wish to say that one of those two conventions must have been a legal convention, upon the theory advocated by the gentleman himself. Now, sir, there were all the delegates elected under the law, and I care not how you divide them; if into two bodies, one of them must have been a legal convention; for one of them must have contained a majority of the legally-elected delegates. It seems to me there is no escaping this conviction. Mathematical demonstration could not be plainer, nor more satisfactory. In some cases it might be a matter of the first importance to determine which of these two bodies was the legal and proper convention. In this case, fortunately, there is no necessity for this inquiry, inasmuch as both agreed upon the same constitution.

Now, sir, the gentleman knows very well that this is so. He knows very well that the final action of those two bodies corresponded in every particular. He knows very well that every member of the two branches of that convention, except some four or five, signed the same constitution, word for word.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman will see by reference to the Senate document (Reports of Committees, No. 21) that the members of the two branches signed different papers, though they may, upon comparison, prove to be alike. They kept up, however, a distinction to the very end.

Mr. JENKINS. I will only say, in reply to that, that I consider that action equivalent to signing the same paper. It makes no sort of difference which paper they signed. Is it the paper which comes here which constitutes the constitution? I say, then, in the first place, by way of a brief recapitulation on this point, that the convention was not a mob; that it was legally and fairly elected under the enabling act and territorial law; that it properly assembled; and if it divided into two branches, that fact makes no difference with the result, as they both signed the constitution; and that it was as justly and strictly a legal constitution as if there had been but one body. In addition to all this, sir, this constitution has the sanction of the popular voice in an almost unparalleled manner; the proportion of the whole vote being about the ratio of sixty in favor, to one against it.

Another objection which the gentleman from Ohio makes against the admission of Minnesota is, that the members of the lower branch of their Legislature are elected for life. Why, sir, if the State of Minnesota chooses to elect her Representatives for life, I cannot see that it is a reasonable objection to her admission. The gentleman may say that it is anti-republican; but I think the gentleman will find it hard to prove it. I admit that it is not such a provision as I would vote for; and if I were in a State which adopted such a constitution, and persisted in retaining it, I would remove from such a State; but I should not consent to see the despotic arm of the Federal Government interpose to remedy the evil; for I believe the evils which would grow out of such a doctrine of interposition would be infinitely worse than those sought to be remedied.

It will not do, sir, simply to say that a feature of a State constitution, permitting Representatives in the Legislature to serve for life, is odious, and therefore sufficient reason for Congress to reject it. I repeat, sir, that however odious such a feature would be, (and it would be as odious to me as to any man living,) still that is a matter for the people of the incipient State to decide for themselves. If they want such a constitution, it is their business, and not yours or mine, as members of a Federal Congress. If the people of a State want such a constitution, we cannot impose a different one upon them against their will. When they choose to change it they can do so. You must then show that such a constitution is anti-republican, or however objectionable it may otherwise be, the Federal Government cannot interfere. Is, then, such a constitution anti-republican?

How, then, shall we ascertain the true meaning of the term "republican," as used in that clause of the Federal Constitution which says "that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government?"

First, let us examine the term itself. Is there anything in its general signification which would imply that it was incompatible with the idea of members of the Legislature being elected for life? Clearly not; for if so, where will you draw the line? Would it be anti-republican to have them made eligible for five years? No one will contend for that. Then would it be anti-republican to have them eligible for ten years? If not so for ten, then for twenty years, or forty, or for life?

Where will the honorable gentleman draw the line, saying that it is republican to elect them for that number of years, but anti-republican to elect for a single year beyond?

But in order to approximate as nearly as possible to the true meaning of the word republican, as used in the Constitution of the United States, let us turn to the constitutions of the respective States existing at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and see what they were; for the very men who framed that instrument participated, to a greater or less extent, in the formation of the State constitutions; and we may very well suppose that they knew what they meant when they used the term "republican." Referring then to the constitution of my own State as it was at the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution, I find that a large portion of the citizens of Virginia were not allowed to vote for any office whatsoever. This was indeed, sir, an odious feature; yet it will not do to say that this constitution was anti-republican, for it would be to stultify many of the fathers of the Republic who participated in the formation of the constitution of Virginia, and also in the formation of the Federal Constitution, which contains the guarantee of a republican form of government to the different States.

Now, sir, if the constitution of Virginia at that time was republican, and surely no one will deny it, you cannot say that another constitution would be anti-republican merely because it allowed members of the Legislature to be elected for life. Certainly this latter feature in a constitution, permitting, nevertheless, a universality of suffrage, would not be less republican than a constitution with members of the Legislature elected for a shorter term, but leaving one half of her citizens totally disfranchised and unrepresented. I could mention other cases stronger even than that of Virginia; but I will merely call attention to Rhode Island. Why, sir, though she had for a constitution only an old royal charter, the framers of the Federal Constitution and the fathers of the Republic considered it a republican form of government. No one will have the hardihood to deny this, for it would be to assert that the whole origin and political history of the Government was a living lie. Sir, I need not animadvert upon the odious features of the Rhode Island government; they are well known. A minority governed, and the majority had no representation in the government. And now, sir, if this was, nevertheless, a republican form of government, which none deny, can it be urged, with a shadow of plausibility, that a constitution is not republican, simply because it elects the members of its Legislature for life? But, sir, I can afford to waive this argument—conclusive of the issue, as I think it to be. Yes, sir, I undertake to assert, and to substantiate the position, that the representatives in the Legislature under the Minnesota constitution are not elected for life. I will prove it by a reference to the constitution itself. I read from the twenty-fourth section of the fourth article:

"The Senators shall also be chosen by single districts of convenient contiguous territory, at the same time that the members of the House of Representatives are required to be chosen, and in the same manner, and no representative district shall be divided in the formation of a Senate district. The Senate districts shall be numbered in regular series, and the Senators chosen by the districts designated by odd numbers shall go out of office at the expiration of the first year, and the Senators chosen by the districts designated by even numbers shall go out of office at the expiration of the second year; and thereafter the Senators shall be chosen for the term of two years, except there shall be an entire new election of all the Senators at the election next succeeding each new apportionment provided for in this article."

Now, sir, inasmuch as by this arrangement of the election of Senators, half of them are elected every year, and inasmuch as the same section provides that the Representatives shall be elected at the same time with the Senators, it follows, as a matter of course, that the Representatives are elected annually. I do not think it necessary to elaborate this point any further, but if it is necessary to say anything more upon this proposition, I think I can refer to other sections of the constitution which will settle the matter beyond all controversy, and which I think must be satisfactory to the gentleman himself.

Referring back to the section preceding the one which I read, I find the following:

"Sec. 23. The Legislature shall provide by law for an enumeration of the inhabitants of this State in the year 1865, and every tenth year thereafter. At their first session after each enumeration so made, and also at their first session after each enumeration made by the authority of the United States, the Legislature shall have the power to prescribe the bounds of congressional, senatorial and representative districts, and to apportion anew the Senators and Representatives among the several districts, according to the provisions of section second of this article."

Then in 1860, the period for taking the next United States census, at the furthest, it becomes the duty of the Legislature of Minnesota to make a different apportionment of the Senators and Representatives of their Legislature, and to make their election accordingly.

But another objection which the honorable gentleman from Ohio urges against the admission of Minnesota under this constitution is, that that constitution allows unnaturalized foreigners to vote, which, he alleges, conflicts with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, if it does not conflict with the Constitution itself. Now, sir, I am very much astonished that the gentleman should have brought this forward as an objection to the admission of Minnesota into the Union as a State. Will the gentleman from Ohio rise in his place and tell me that the sovereign State of Ohio cannot, if she pleases, permit unnaturalized foreigners to vote for members of her Legislature? I pause for a reply. The gentleman does not reply, and I therefore conclude that he is not anxious to commit himself upon that proposition. I think the gentleman ought to commit himself upon that proposition before he makes that as an objection to the admission of another State.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Ohio never did allow unnaturalized foreigners to vote; and never will.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman does not answer the question. He says Ohio has not; but he does not say she cannot, if she sees proper, admit whom she pleases to vote. In my own State we do not permit unnaturalized foreigners to vote. No man is more opposed to that than myself. If I had been a citizen of Minnesota, or a member of the convention which framed her constitution, I should have opposed it to the last. I do not believe that any unnaturalized foreigner should be allowed to vote even for a member of the Legislature of the various States; but that is a matter resting with the individual States themselves. If the people of Ohio, or the people of Virginia, choose to permit unnaturalized foreigners to vote, they may do so. If the people of Minnesota choose to allow unnaturalized foreigners to vote, they can do so. And we have no right to urge as an objection against the admission of Minnesota under her present constitution, an argument which we would not apply to our own States.

But the gentleman from Ohio became very humorous in that part of his speech, and compared the admission of Minnesota to a wedding. He says he does not like to see our younger sister playing pranks in this way. He wants to see her wedded to the Union decently and respectfully. All I have to say in regard to that is this: that if the gentleman wanted her to be wedded decently into the Union, he ought to have given her a decent license. I refer to the enabling act for Minnesota, which allows unnaturalized foreigners to vote for members of the constitutional convention. And I find that the honorable gentleman himself voted for that license. Here, then, is the very clerk that issued the license under which Minnesota is to be wedded, who comes up at the eleventh hour and makes use of the imperfection of that license as a reason why she ought to be kept out of the Union.

I hold in my hand the enabling act under which the members of the convention were elected, and I find the name of my honorable friend from Ohio recorded in favor of it. When I interrupted the gentleman in his speech to ask him if he did not vote for it, he could not see the application of the question. I hope he perceives the application of it by this time. Indeed, I think before he completed his speech he began to comprehend its application; for he endeavored to break its force and to account for his inconsistency on that point by saying that it was late in the session, and that the bill was put through under the previous question. In reply to that, sir, I say that whether it was put through under the previous question or any other way, I am astonished that any gentleman holding a seat on this floor as a Representative, would make that excuse for voting for an act enabling the people of a Territory to form a constitution, and then come up here when the State, acting under that full power, asks to be admitted into the Union, and pleads his own wrong as a reason why she should not be admitted. Sir, if the gentleman had any speech to make against permitting unnaturalized foreigners to vote, he should have made it then. That was the time he should have urged this argument against admitting foreigners to vote. I was not a member of the House at that time, but I see by the record that if the previous question was seconded on that occasion, the Republican party is responsible for it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I know that I, and a good many others assisting me, tried very hard to prevent the previous question until we might amend the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. I have got the vote on ordering the main question; and I find that a large majority of the Republican party was in its favor. Mr. Speaker, that only shows how gentlemen will resort to a subterfuge to accomplish their political purposes. Here is a gentleman who opposes a State coming into the Union—although not a slave State, a Democratic State—with three Democratic Representatives knocking at the door of this Hall; and he resorts not only to every subterfuge, on which he can base the flimsiest arguments to oppose her admission into the Union, but he pleads his own wrong in the case.

I find that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow,] a prominent member of the Republican party, moved the previous question on the passage of the Minnesota enabling act, and that a large majority of those who voted for it were members of that party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman told us in his speech that he wanted the voice of the people in all State constitutions. Well, if he has not got the voice of the people in favor of the Minnesota constitution, I do not know when he ever will hear the voice of the people. It speaks in tones of thunder with a greater relative majority, I undertake to say, than was ever given in favor of the admission heretofore of any other Territory as a State into the Union.

Sir, the popular voice of Minnesota proclaims thirty thousand for to about five hundred against. If that is not the voice of the people, and a practical expression of it, I do not know where you will find it. There was a great fact staring the gentleman in the face, and how does he try to obviate it? Why, he says there were frauds there. Where are the proofs before this House, of any frauds in this case? The gentleman said in his speech that there were newspaper rumors. Are the newspaper publications of the day to be used here as arguments against the admission of a sovereign State into the Union? If so, sir, a corrupt party, with a corrupt press, may hereafter keep out every Territory applying for admission into the Confederacy. I say, sir, I will hold him and his party responsible for making, this day and on this floor, this charge against the people of Minnesota of having sent here, as their organic law, a constitution which is the work of trickery and fraud.

A final argument which the gentleman adduced against the admission of Minnesota under her constitution, was that the people had recently made an amendment to it, which allowed a loan of $5,000,000 to some railroad companies; but is that any business of ours? With what propriety can an argument of this sort be brought forward in this way? If they choose to loan five million, or ten million dollars, it is their own money, and not the money of the State of Ohio, or of the State of Virginia. Sir, it is idle and vain to use such pretexts as these to cover up a move upon the political chess-board. It will strike every man of understanding as being absurd and ridiculous in the extreme, to stand up here and talk about opposing the admission of Minnesota into the Union because an amendment to her constitution authorizes the government to loan money to railroad companies.

Mr. Speaker, as I said when I first rose, I had not the slightest idea of addressing the House upon this question. The remarks which I have made have been strictly in answer to the arguments brought forward by the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I have made them only because I thought those arguments were of such an extraordinary nature that they should not be passed by unnoticed upon this floor.

I have only to say, sir, in conclusion, without stopping to canvass the merits of the various amendments offered to this bill, that I am in favor of the admission of Minnesota into this Union. I believe that no reasonable argument can be brought forward against that admission. No hue-and-cry can be raised against her on account of irregularity or turbulence in her proceedings. She comes here with a constitution formed by a legally-elected convention, fairly and legitimately elected by the people, and with the voice of the people potential in its favor. The cry cannot be raised that there have been blood and fraud and murder in the Territory, and that the true will of the people has been suppressed. Minnesota comes here with no stain of blood upon her garments; she comes attended by the handmaids of peace and plenty. I trust, sir, that this House will pass, by a large majority, an act admitting her as a State into this Union. I trust that that majority will be so large that it will stifle the expressions which have gone forth from some gentlemen upon this floor of the Republican party, who have sought to insult and degrade the people of Minnesota by charging frauds upon them in their recent election. I trust that the act of admitting her will be consummated at once, thereby bringing another star within our political system, the grandeur of whose structure, the beauty of whose proportions, and the harmony of whose movements, will be the admiration of succeeding ages.

Mr. GARNETT obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. GARNETT. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories. I make the motion merely to keep the bill before the House. I see that we are not likely to have a vote upon it to-day, and I do not wish it to go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. GARNETT. Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased at the course which this debate has taken, because I hope it exonerates me in the eyes of everybody from any charge of a desire to defeat the admission of a free State because it is a free State, in the remarks which I shall make upon this bill. I suppose, sir, that when a gentleman so noted as a leader in the Republican camp as the honorable member from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] takes ground against the admission of Minnesota, it cannot be contended on any side that the opposition to this bill, or rather the opposition to certain features in the bill, arises from a desire to defeat the admission of a free State. I am glad that the sectional question is entirely removed from the discussion, and that we can address ourselves to the questions that legitimately arise out of the circumstances under which Minnesota seeks admission into the Union.

I say more, sir; I say that I hope that none will inquire what party is to be benefited by the admission of Minnesota. I confess that some of the remarks which the gentleman from Ohio made, seemed to me to indicate a disposition on his part to vote against the admission of Minnesota not merely for the reasons which he assigned, but also because it so happens that the Senators and members elect are Democratic, and I almost feared that my own colleague and valued friend [Mr. JENKINS] had allowed this fact to sway his judgment in favor of the admission of Minnesota.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I understand the gentleman to repeat what his colleague [Mr. JENKINS] said a while ago, that my position in reference to this bill was in consequence of the election of Democratic Senators and Representatives. Now, sir, if I consulted my own feelings and interests, probably I should vote for the admission of Minnesota; but I am actuated by no such motive. I simply desired to call the attention of Congress to the necessity of requiring of each Territory regularity and conformity to law in forming their State constitution. I disclaim any other motive.

Mr. GARNETT. I am glad to hear the gentleman's disclaimer. I was about to say that the admission of a sovereign State into the Confederacy is too important a question, not merely in itself, but in the consequences which it carries as a precedent, for any man to permit his judgment to be governed by party considerations. For my own part, I care not one iota, in the vote which I shall give on this occasion, whether the Senators and Representatives elect belong to the one party or to the other. I shall not permit myself to inquire into it, nor allow my judgment to be in the least degree whatever swayed by that fact. The people of Minnesota are entitled to such Representatives as they choose to elect; they are entitled to belong to whichever party they prefer; and their choice shall not influence my vote.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in the first place, that I voted against the enabling act of last session for Minnesota, and, amongst other reasons, because that enabling act contained a clause permitting alien suffrage; for while I have never belonged to the American party, while, in all my political action, I have steadily and earnestly opposed that party, yet I do entirely disapprove, in common with ninety-nine out of one hundred of the voters of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, permitting unnaturalized foreigners to vote in our Territories.

Sir, I had another objection to that enabling act. There was a solemn stipulation, when my State surrendered the vast empire of the Northwest, between the Federal Union on the one part, and the States on the other, that not more than five States should be formed out of that territory. It was a stipulation which was of the utmost importance, because the other sections of the Confederacy did not consider that their interests would allow more than ten votes in the Senate of the United States to the northwest territory then ceded.

Sir, that stipulation has been violated. You have five States formed out of that territory already, and twenty-odd thousand square miles go to the formation of this State of Minnesota. Gentlemen on the other side of the House talk about a breach of faith in the repeal of the Missouri restriction—a breach of faith which was simply the repeal by one Congress of what they believed to be the unconstitutional legislation of a preceding one. But here, sir, was a compact entered into contemporaneously with the Constitution of the United States. That compact was deliberately violated in the formation of the Territory of Minnesota, as was boasted in debate here at the time. But, does it stop even here? We learn now from the newspapers that there is to be a proposition for the formation of another State out of portions of Wisconsin and Michigan, with the outlandish name of Ontonagon, or something like it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is pronounced Ontonagan.

Mr. GARNETT. Well, it is a fit name for a State which, in all probability, will be inhabited by scarcely anybody that can speak the English language—the outpourings of every foreign hive that cannot support its own citizens.

But, sir, if I consent to waive all these objections, then I ask how does Minnesota apply here for admission into the Union? An enabling act was passed. Has she complied with that enabling act? Is there any valid constitution of Minnesota before us? I take it that a constitution must be the act of the people, done either under the sanction and authority of Congress, or without that previous sanction, in the way of peaceful revolution, as in the case of Oregon and others. If the former, then, acting under an enabling act, the terms of the law must be followed—the provisions of the deed of trust must be strictly pursued. If the latter, it must be with the assent and under the laws of the existing territorial government—the de facto government—the only political organization existing there besides the Federal Government.

But how was it in Minnesota? Your Federal law of last session authorized a convention of seventy-eight members. But the Territorial Legislature intervened, and called a convention of one hundred and eight members; so that the very first act of the existing government there was to violate the enabling act. You authorized a convention with one number of members—they called a convention with another number. And even this territorial law of their own commanded no more respect than did our law, and they elected, neither seventy-eight members, as we required, nor one hundred and eight, as their Legislature prescribed, but one hundred and thirteen, thus showing, at every step, that they lacked the very first characteristic of a capacity for self-government—a reverence for law, and a will to abide by it.

Things were still worse when these one hundred and thirteen delegates attempted to meet in convention. They could not agree even to organize or sit in the same hall; but they formed themselves into two separate and distinct conventions, if I may dignify such assemblies by that term, in separate rooms, one composed of fifty-five; and the other of fifty-eight members.

Mr. TRIPPE. I just want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia. I desire to call his attention to another fact in reference to the number of members of these conventions. The report of the Senate recites, as the gentleman has stated, that there were fifty-eight members in one convention, and fifty-five in the other. But fifty-two of the latter signed the constitution. The Delegate from that Territory certifies that three were absent. In the other convention we are informed officially by the Senate committee that there were fifty-eight members; but, if you will count the names, you will find that fifty-nine signed the constitution.

Mr. GARNETT. I took it for granted that the statement of the Senate committee was correct; but, sir, it seems that this whole proceeding is as irregular as it is possible to make it, and that the Senate Committee on Territories were unable to count what the people of Minnesota were unable to do. I say, therefore, that this constitution was not the act of the people of Minnesota, for it was not the act of their conventions. There was no convention. Who ever heard of two constitutional conventions sitting at the same time, and representing different factions or sections of the people? This instrument, agreed on by committees of conference, and adopted without deliberation or discussion, was not the work of a convention. Deliberation in common is as essential as voting in common. The discussion of propositions and amendments, and the gradual elimination of differences, are the only intelligent basis for final consent; and lawgivers have no right to act unless they are assembled together according to law. Their powers belong to them collectively, as one body, and not individually. And this pretended constitution derives no more force from the signatures of the members individually, than if each man had signed at his own home, and had never seen his fellow-members. The convention, and the convention alone—that is, the people of Minnesota acting through their representatives, according to law—could form a constitution; and no convention ever met or organized. There is, therefore, no constitution.

But I am told by the Delegate from Minnesota, and by other gentlemen, that this instrument was ratified by a popular vote. Well, sir, I thought the argument on our side of the House had been that a mere popular vote could not give validity to that which was invalid before; that the mere vote of a numerical majority, however large that majority might be, could not make that law which was not law according to the recognized legal forms. I thought that was the doctrine of this side at least, if not of the other. Yet the gentleman tells me that the mere popular vote makes the law! Who had the authority to submit it to the people? The convention itself? There was no convention held. And I maintain that the mere vote of the people of Minnesota upon that which was not a constitution in itself, which had not been formed by a lawful convention, was of no sort of force or effect. For, sir, ours is not a mobocracy; it is not a government of mere numbers, or of unorganized masses; but it is a representative democracy. The voters at the polls may elect their representatives, and they may ratify what their representatives have done; but it is only through those representatives in convention, or according to law, assembled, that they can make or propose a constitution. And to permit this high prerogative of sovereignty to be exercised by mere individuals, as in Minnesota, is in direct violation of every rational principle of free popular government.

Now, sir, when Minnesota comes forward under such circumstances as these, and I am asked to overlook all these irregularities and objections; to acquiesce in a violation of the compact of 1787, and to accept that as a constitution which is no constitution at all, and that as the act of the people, which has no legal authentication, then I may venture to open that constitution and to inquire which of its provisions peculiarly commend themselves to my favor. I maintain that Congress has no power to regulate suffrage within the States; but where there is no enabling act, or where its provisions have been utterly set at nought and disregarded, I may, in the exercise of a sound constitutional discretion, deliberate upon the admission, just as I might do on the original passage of an enabling act, and I may inquire whether such people as the Mormons, for instance, or a community where negroes vote, are pleasant and desirable partners and associates, on an equal footing, in this Union of ours?

Well, then, sir, looking into this remarkable Minnesota document, I find it declared that not only aliens may vote, but absolutely Indians and persons of mixed blood! provided they have adopted the customs and habits of civilization, or are capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship. I venture to say that such a provision was never before seen, except in Nicaragua, or some such pretended Republic of South American barbarians.

I call the attention of the House specially to the classes which are permitted to vote:

- "1. White citizens of the United States.
- "2. White persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intention to become citizens conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization.
- "3. Persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization."

Who is to be the judge?

The next class is:

- "4. Persons of Indian blood residing in the State, who have adopted the language, customs, and habits of civilization, after an examination before any district court of the State, in such manner as may be provided by law, and shall have been pronounced by said court capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State."

What is the test of their capacity of enjoying the rights of citizenship? Who is to be the judge whether these mixed bloods have adopted the customs and habits of citizens? and what shall be the standard? Who are to be the jury?

Mr. JENKINS. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARNETT. I will hear my colleague.

Mr. JENKINS. I understood the gentleman to say that nobody outside of Nicaragua would have made such a constitution as that. Now, unless I am very much mistaken, some of the original States adopted provisions which would have permitted these men to vote; and at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, some of the States went further, and allowed every male inhabitant to vote, with a property qualification, which would not only have admitted mixed bloods, but even free negroes. And provisions of that kind were found in the constitutions of some of the southern States.

Mr. GARNETT. Admitting the facts stated by my colleague to be correct, I do not see that they affect the statement I made. In the instances he adduces, there was at least a certainty; the classes of voters were defined. But here the barbarism of the provisions themselves are mingled with a vague reference to the customs of civilization. Such a statute of suffrage is not one of the "customs and habits" of civilized communities, nor do I think it peculiarly good proof that its makers are themselves eminently capable of "enjoying the rights of citizenship." The vagueness and uncertainty of such words, on such a subject, are without precedent. When the judges of election or the courts have inquired who were the father and the mother and the ancestors of the person who claims to vote, and settled his genealogy and blood, I would like to know how they will try his civilization—by what standard of habits and customs they will measure it.

Mr. BLAIR. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state how that occurred.

Mr. GARNETT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLAIR. At one of the precincts one pair of breeches was obtained, and thirty-five Indians were successively put into it, and in that way it was ascertained that he had adopted the habits of civilized life. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNETT. Very much like the Irishman in Mobile. It was a question whether he was naturalized. He was asked how many years he had been here. It was said that he had been here for five years. "And faith," said he, "and have I not been voting for the Democratic party ever since I came?" [Laughter.] I do not know what was the decision of the court, any more than I do what it was in the case referred to by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR.]

Allow me to suppose my colleague himself acting as a judge of election in Minnesota; and a dusky colored individual comes before him, and claims to vote. First the question of blood must be investigated, and various doubtful questions of paternity must be settled. And when the pure Indian or the mixed blood is proved, my colleague will ask, "have you adopted the habits and customs of civilization; are you capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship?" I must be permitted to doubt who will find it most difficult—the Indian to answer such questions, or the judge, even were he my colleague, to tell what he meant by them. Perhaps he would escape the difficulty by referring it to a jury; and then I suppose it must be a jury de medietate linguæ, gathered from the foreign tribes who compose so large a part of Minnesota's population. There might be one fourth of the jury German, one fourth Norwegian, one fourth Irish, and one fourth of Indian and mixed blood; and the only man in court speaking English would be the honorable judge. What a tribunal to try questions of civilization and capacity of citizenship with the Indians and half-breeds! These are the people who seriously come here and ask admission at our hands.

Mr. JENKINS. I would ask my colleague whether these matters would not be proper when the question was up for the passage of an enabling act? Are we not pledged by the law which we have passed for Minnesota, to admit her into the Union when she presents herself here under it? Are we not bound by a moral obligation in the matter?

Mr. GARNETT. I will answer my friend with pleasure. I am glad that he has asked me the question. There is one of the many enormities of the rules of this House by which a constituency, through its Representative, has no power of initiating anything, and by which a tyrannical majority may prevent anything being fairly discussed and considered, after it is initiated. The Minnesota enabling act was hurried through under the whip and spur of the previous question. There was no opportunity to amend or discuss it. I voted against it.

But take my colleague's argument. If I have shown anything, I have shown that Minnesota has not complied with the enabling act. She has not followed her own territorial law; and yet, sir, she now claims admission on the faith of those laws. Under the circumstances, I say that her application is to be considered de novo; and that I have a right to look into the facts, as I would on the enabling act itself.

But I was speaking of the character of this population; and I alluded to them without the slightest disrespect to the honorable gentleman who represents them here.

I will now ask the attention of the House to their mode of proceeding under this so-called constitution. It requires all laws passed by the Legislature to be signed by the Governor of the State. But it is as contemptuously treated by these people as was our enabling act; for, as I am reliably informed, a Legislature has been elected and assembled, and its acts were signed, not by their own Governor, but by a United States officer, by the territorial Secretary of State, who acts as Federal Governor pro tempore. Their government is thus neither fish, flesh, nor fowl; but a strange mongrel, half State and half territorial; I suppose like some of its voters, of mixed blood.

And to illustrate still further their utter contempt for law and constitution, and entire disregard for the great conservative principles of republican government, they have, in another particular, violated what they tell us is their constitution. It forbids the creation of a public debt. It was made only last fall; but already the Legislature has authorized a debt of $5,000,000; openly avows that the law violates the constitution it swears to observe; and then, to cap the climax, appeals to a popular vote to ratify the violation. And I presume if the popular vote made the constitution without a convention, so it can violate it; and it is a grave question whether that violation, so effected, has not changed the constitution; and whether Minnesota can be admitted with this instrument here before us as its constitution, when it seems she is already acting under another—under another different in its legislative power, and with quite a novel kind of State Governor, appointed by the President? Are such men, and is such a community as this, entitled to any special consideration from us? Ought we to be in hot haste, and should we strain points to get them into the Union? Here there is no fierce sectional war to be quieted; no great principle of State or sectional equality to be vindicated; there is nothing but the merits of the case to determine our judgments.

I come now immediately to my amendment. The Senate bill gives Minnesota two Representatives. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STREPHENS] proposes to give her three. I propose that she shall have but one. My reasons may be briefly stated.

Those members have been elected. Pass the Senate bill, and how are we to decide which two of the three are the preference of the people of Minnesota?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That matter has been settled by the members themselves. One has drawn out by lot, and only two will present themselves here.

Mr. GARNETT. That is of a part with the rest. The members undertake to say which the people would prefer. I do not think anything could be in more utter contempt of the right of the people to choose their own Representatives. Adopt the Senate bill to-morrow, and the election will have to go back to the people. Who is to represent Minnesota, whether Democrats or Republicans, must be decided hereafter by the people; so that the party character of the present members elect ought not to influence any man's decision, if the Senate bill passes unchanged.

But is Minnesota entitled to three members? The Delegate from that Territory says that by a late census it is ascertained that her population is one hundred and fifty thousand, leaving out Indians and mixed bloods. Agreed; but by the representative ratio it takes two hundred and eighty thousand to give three members. With what justice can Minnesota ask for three Representatives with only one hundred and fifty thousand, when the other States have only three for two hundred and eighty thousand, and, that too, by a census taken eight years ago? The one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants are but little more than half the number required for three Representatives. The number required for two Representatives is one hundred and eighty-seven thousand, and one hundred and fifty thousand falls very far short of that also. And here let me say that few States are not entitled to Representatives for fractions, for they already have a great advantage in the fact that you are giving them representation according to a ratio determined from the population of the United States, not as it is now when theirs is computed, but as it was several years before. In this case you are comparing the population of Minnesota in 1858 with the old States; not in 1858, but in 1850.

Sir, let us look at this, and see how it works: Here is the State of Texas with four hundred and fifty thousand Federal population, as I am informed by one of her Representatives. She has two members upon this floor, while Minnesota, with a population of only one hundred and fifty thousand at the very same date, demands three Representatives. Again, look forward to the presidential election of 1860, and how will it be then? Texas, with a population of four hundred and fifty thousand, will have but four votes in the electoral college. You propose to give Minnesota in the same election, with a population of one hundred and fifty thousand, exactly one third that of Texas, the same number, or even more, five votes—one more than Texas.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Republican votes, too.

Mr. GARNETT. I have very little doubt of it; I fear she will follow the Republican States around her, and be carried into the same current of madness; and were this a fair consideration to guide us, I would beg my friends upon this side of the House not to pursue a course so perfectly suicidal.

But, sir, as I said before, I am not considering that. I consider only the question of justice. Three Representatives for one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants give one to every fifty thousand; and two Representatives give one to every seventy-five thousand. I ask gentlemen upon the other side of the House to divide the population of the United States by the number of Representatives upon this floor, and they will find that the ratio is probably about one to one hundred and thirty thousand or one hundred and forty thousand. Why should fifty thousand men in Minnesota exercise as much power here as one hundred and forty thousand men in New York, Ohio, or any other State? The district of my colleague [Mr. JENKINS] and my own contain a population over two hundred thousand, and their vote is to be balanced, or even overpowered and controlled on this floor by only one hundred and fifty thousand men in Minnesota. Why should we Virginians—men whose forefathers, generation after generation, spent their blood and their treasure, and have exercised every power of their minds, for the growth of this Confederacy—be placed in a condition of inequality, and be outvoted and controlled by the host of Europeans and the tribes of Indians and mixed bloods who are so numerous in Minnesota? It is neither equal nor honorable to us; not honorable to the State of Virginia; not honorable to the State of New York, Ohio, or any other State of this Union.

Mr. JENKINS. I understood the gentleman to say that my district had a population of two hundred thousand.

Mr. GARNETT. No, sir; but that your district and mine had together over two hundred thousand, and that we have but two Representatives upon this floor; while the gentleman from Georgia proposes to give Minnesota, with a population of one hundred and fifty thousand, three votes, and the Senate bill two votes.

Mr. JENKINS. Why not take the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KINGSBURY] as to the amount of population?

Mr. GARNETT. Throughout all this Kansas controversy, whose echoes are scarcely yet silent in this Hall, it was contended that the LeCompton constitution was the act of the people of Kansas, because we, as legislators, could know nothing except through the forms of law. Sir, I have no knowledge of the population of Minnesota, and I can have none for legislative purposes, except through a census conducted according to law.

If I should take the conjectures of the honorable gentleman from Minnesota, and of other honorable gentlemen, where should I stop? One gentleman might tell me that Minnesota has a million inhabitants. It is conjecture only. I might say that my conjecture is that they have only ten thousand. Will gentlemen take that conjecture? One is entitled to as much weight as the other. We stand upon the law, and upon the forms of law, and upon information furnished us by legal proceedings, and we cannot go behind it. I have no reason to doubt that the census was substantially correct. I have heard a great deal about the incorrectness of censuses. I heard that, in the last census, the population of the city of Richmond was greatly underrated, and a delegation was sent to Washington to induce the Secretary of the Interior to have another census taken. It was done; and it turned out that the first census was only a few hundred short of the last one. In a vast Territory like Minnesota, where the population is scattered, no one individual can have the proper data for forming a correct judgment. In such cases, when we find that our conjectures as to the amount of population are disappointed, our first impulse is to question the correctness of the census.

Will my colleague expect me to take such a declaration as this of the Delegate from Minnesota, [Mr. KINGSBURY:]

"In order to accomplish this result, [the taking of a census,] the marshal has from time to time inclosed such returns, as he finds properly made out, to the Secretary of the Interior. And I find that within the last few days a final report has been forwarded embracing nearly all the State, together with a clear and succinct statement of the difficulties attendant upon the taking of this census, giving something over one hundred and fifty thousand people—exclusive of mixed bloods and Indians who have adopted the habits and customs of civilization—in the limits of the proposed State."

He goes on to say:—

"With these few facts to predicate an opinion upon, my own convictions are, that the State possesses sufficient population, in addition to what has been returned, to more than entitle us to two members—if, indeed, we have not enough to warrant the admission of three, in view of the heavy accessions, by emigration, constantly pouring in through the various channels leading toward our State, since the taking of the census began."

It is such vague assertions as these that my colleague and the Committee on Territories propose to take, instead of the facts returned by the census taken under the law.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is not the recommendation of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. GARNETT. I am glad to hear it. I should have said, proposed by the chairman of that committee. The gentleman from Minnesota goes on to argue that, because there were thirty thousand voters, therefore there must be a great population.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I take very considerable interest in this matter, and I desire to get at the facts. An estimate of the population has been made from the number of votes cast in the Territory. There has recently been an election held in that Territory; and, if we are to take that as a basis, I would like to ask the Delegate from Minnesota how many votes were cast in the recent election upon the adoption of the proposed amendment to the constitution?

Mr. KINGSBURY. I am not able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Last year there were some twenty thousand. In the city of St. Paul there were some four thousand two hundred votes cast. Perhaps some gentleman can tell me the amount of population in that city. In Winona there were some one thousand one hundred and eighty-one votes cast. Perhaps the gentleman from Minnesota can tell the population of Winona?

Mr. KINGSBURY. I do not know much about Winona, or its population; but the population of St. Paul is about sixteen thousand.

Mr. GARNETT. Here is the actual census of the Territory showing the population to be one hundred and thirty-three thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine; but since this report, I am told that other returns have come in and carried the number up to one hundred and fifty thousand three hundred and sixty, the utmost amount that can be figured up for that population by the official returns.

According to the facts, in the city of St. Paul, as brought out by the gentleman from Illinois, the proportion of the population to the voters is not quite four to one. I believe the gentleman from Georgia estimates the usual proportion elsewhere as six to one. Therefore, if the voters were only twenty thousand, as I understand they were in the State elections, the population will be estimated at between eighty thousand and one hundred and twenty thousand, either number being under what I have assumed in my argument from the census returns. If the voters are thirty thousand, then the whole population would be between one hundred and twenty thousand and one hundred and eighty thousand.

Mr. KINGSBURY. The highest estimate of voters is forty thousand.

Mr. GARNETT. The official returns in the Senate report show thirty thousand and fifty-five in favor of the constitution, and five hundred and seventy-one against it.

Mr. KINGSBURY. There were thirty-seven thousand and seventy-one votes counted for members of Congress.

Mr. GARNETT. It really seems that we are in the land of contradictions when we come to Minnesota. We have so many different statements as to the vote, that it appears these Minnesota voters were more like Falstaff's men in buckram than any other army whose muster-rolls are in history.

Mr. KINGSBURY. The counties that I represent were not counted on the vote for the constitution.

Mr. GARNETT. Yes, Mr. Speaker, and the emigrants who arrived in the country since the vote was taken did not get there in time to be counted; and yet we have heard arguments in the other wing of the Capitol, that such emigrants ought to be counted in the estimate of the population. In any new State, especially where there are foreign emigrants, you will find that the adult male population does not bear the usual proportion to the whole population, because the emigration consists of adult males in much larger proportion than a long-settled population shows; and the consequence is, that four or five to one is a high proportion. If you take five to one, and assume thirty thousand, the number of votes cast on the constitution, as the basis, then the whole population will be one hundred and fifty thousand, exactly what the census shows; one result confirming the other. Even the largest calculation of six to one upon thirty-seven thousand votes will give a population of only two hundred and twenty-two thousand, while it takes two hundred and eighty thousand to entitle a State to the three Representatives. So that according to no showing whatever—even the most extravagant and loosest—can it be pretended that Minnesota is entitled to three Representatives on this floor, unless there be something in her constitution, or the character of her population, to entitle her to greater control in the politics of the country than the citizens of Virginia, of Connecticut, of New York, or of South Carolina.

Mr. CURTIS. The ratio of the population in the State of Iowa, where I think the population is of the same character as Minnesota, is about one to six. We have over six hundred thousand inhabitants; and we never cast more than one hundred thousand votes, so that the population would be about six to one. I think that is about the average.

Mr. GARNETT. Iowa is an older State, and has been longer settled, and is not a fair test of the population of a new Territory which has settled with great rapidity; but even if that proportion held good in Minnesota, I have just shown that even then she is not entitled to the number of Representatives proposed, and I hold that, as regards new States, we ought to confine ourselves strictly to the ratio.

The gentleman from Minnesota says in his argument that Minnesota has four thousand votes more than Iowa cast when she had two members, and seven thousand more than Arkansas when she had two members. Let me tell the gentleman that Iowa and Arkansas were both admitted originally with only one member each, the number which I propose by my amendment to give to Minnesota.

The gentleman says that Congress should admit Minnesota because she has complied with her contract. I answer that she has not complied with her contract. She has not followed the enabling act. She has not followed her own territorial interpretation of that enabling act; but she comes to us in contempt of all law and order. I do not admit that where a Territory forms a government without an enabling act, or without complying with the enabling act, and where Congress does not recognize the application, that she is a State out of the Union. If we reject the application of Minnesota, she remains exactly what she was before, a Territory of the United States, subject to the legislative authority of Congress, to be exercised in pursuance of the terms, trusts, and limitations of the Constitution of United States. In the name of my State, in the name of the good old district I represent, the first spot where Anglo-Saxon footsteps ever trod on American soil—the last spot consecrated by the crowning victory of the Revolution—the birth-place of its hero and leader—the ancient town and capital whence Virginia sent forth her laws and colonists to conquer and to occupy this very northwestern country; I say, sir, in the name of that old district, illustrious with so many glories, I protest against the people of Minnesota, whether native, foreign, Indian, or mixed, being allowed twice the power and influence that are given to my people in this Government. I hope you will adopt my amendment or reject the bill.

Mr. GROW. I have but a word to say on this question; and before proceeding to the main subject, I desire to notice a few objections to this application of the people of Minnesota made by the gentleman from Virginia who has just taken his seat, [Mr. GARNETT.] He said that Virginia ceded the Northwest Territory with the condition that but five States were to be carved out of it. That is true; and but five States have been made; and where, then, is the violation of the agreement? A small portion of the territory included in Minnesota was included in the grant from Virginia; but that is no violation of the agreement, for the reason that Minnesota contains an area of ninety thousand square miles, being larger in area than any State in the Union—one third larger than the State of Virginia. How is it a violation of the stipulation in the grant of Virginia that a small strip of territory not included in the five States is added to other territory large enough of itself to make a great State? But if it were, the complaint comes with a bad grace from that side of the House. Your fathers and our fathers made a compact in 1820, by which the Louisiana purchase, west of the then limits of Missouri and north of 36° 30' was dedicated forever to freedom; but afterwards you took the Platte counties, now the seven western counties of Missouri, the richest and noblest portion of that State, from under the operation of that ordinance, and dedicated it to slavery. Your fathers did that, and you have justified the act.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he did not help, by his vote for the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, to dedicate that country to slavery, provided the people should so vote?

Mr. GROW. What country?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The country north of 36° 30' included in the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. GROW. I will answer that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the Kansas controversy is for the present ended, [laughter;] and that this debate is not, therefore, relevant.

Mr. GROW. That is rather a hard ruling, for it deprives me of an opportunity of answering the question; but I submit to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the Speaker had no allusion to me; for I did not bring the subject up.

Mr. GROW. I have answered the objection made by the gentleman from Virginia, that we have not kept faith with the agreement made with his fathers. I shall have some other opportunity to answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia, for, although you say Kansas is dead, and banished from this Hall, it will come back to haunt you, as did the ghost the murderer in the play. It will be here again ere long; and then it will be in order to answer the gentleman's question.

I proceed now to answer another objection raised by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT.] He says he is opposed to the Minnesota constitution, because it allows men of mixed blood to vote in the elections in the State. The gentleman from Virginia voted the other day to permit Indians in the Territory of Kansas, who had adopted the habits of white men, to vote. The laws existing in Kansas in October last in reference to the qualifications of voters, which were adopted as establishing the qualifications of voters under what is called the English amendment, and for which the gentleman from Virginia voted, allow Indians, who have adopted the habits of white men, to vote. It comes, therefore, with a bad grace from the gentleman from Virginia to object now to a similar provision in the Minnesota constitution.

Mr. TRIPPE. Does not that relate to Indians who have been made citizens by treaty?

Mr. GROW. No, sir; the law is unlimited and unrestricted. Any Indian who has adopted the habits of the white man, may vote in the Territory of Kansas, under the laws which existed in October last, and which the gentleman voted to fix as the qualification of voters under the English bill. For two years the people of Kansas called upon you to relieve them from the wrongs and outrages heaped upon them by imported voters and suborned Indians, who voted them down at the ballot-box; but you turned a deaf ear to all their appeals; and it comes now with a bad grace from gentlemen upon the other side, when the people of Minnesota have formed a constitution and fixed the qualifications of voters to please themselves, to object to this feature in that instrument. Whilst the Territory is in a territorial condition, Congress has control over the qualifications of voters; and it is its duty to correct and prevent abuses of the elective franchise therein; but, when the people form a State, they have a right to fix the qualifications of voters within the limits of that State, and to allow those to vote whom they please. In our case, we made appeals in behalf of right and justice, where we had the power to act; in your case, you propose to trample down State rights to correct an abuse you complain of.

Mr. Speaker, my notions of territorial governments are, that, at the earliest practicable period at which the people of a Territory can change their political relations and take upon themselves a government of their own, without imposing upon themselves grievous burdens, it is the duty of this Government to grant them a State organization. That was the position I occupied two years ago, in defense of the people of Kansas in changing their government. They asked us to give them a State government; why? Because the grievances of the territorial organization were too great to be borne. The Republicans of the House were ready to grant their request, and allow them to take the government upon themselves and manage their own affairs in their own way. In 1849 the Territory of Minnesota was organized. After nine years she presents herself before the country as a State, unrivaled in the rapidity of her growth and the enterprise of her citizens, with all the internal resources of a great empire, with ninety thousand square miles of territory, and with a population, according to the different estimates of different persons, of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand. Within this short period has this State sprung up in the wilderness upon the fountains of the "Father of Waters," and presents herself to-day, with this vast population and these great resources, and seeks admission into the Confederacy.

Now, what is the objection? She has population enough, so that no grievous burdens will be imposed upon her people in assuming the duties and responsibilities and the taxation incident to a State organization, and that is the only consideration that would ever weigh with me in determining the time when a Territory should change its condition. Whenever its population is numerous enough, and possesses wealth and resources sufficient to support a government without imposing excessive burdens upon its people, they are then entitled, by all the maxims of our system of government, and the teachings of our fathers, to govern themselves. This idea of requiring an abstract number of population in a Territory as a condition of admission, is an absurdity, in view of the rights of self-government which belong to freemen. Whilst the Territories remain in a territorial condition they must be under the supervision of Congress; otherwise you abandon your control over your Territories. Congress must have supervision over the acts of their territorial government, and the manner in which their policy shall be administered. When the time comes, however, for a change into States, they throw off their subjection to the central power.

I do not agree with my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] with whom I agree upon most subjects, that much weight ought to be attached to the preliminary steps in forming a constitution. I care not whether there be one or a thousand delegates engaged in forming a State constitution for a people, and sending it here for our approval. It is in the nature of a petition to you, asking you to grant their prayer. When there has been a popular vote on the constitution it embodies the people's will; and I care not who form it, or by what forms it was made. If it embodies the will of the people it has my sanction, unless there are provisions in it in violation of the Constitution of the United States, or repugnant to the spirit and genius of our institutions. The will of the people embodied in their constitution is the supreme law; and when we are satisfied that the constitution does embody their will, what matters it whether it was formed by men elected in accordance with law, or by men elected against law? What matters it whether it was formed by one man, or by a thousand? If the people have ratified it at the ballot-box, and put the seal of their approval upon it, if you have got their will fairly embodied, that is sufficient.

In the case of Minnesota, her people have thus passed upon her constitution. I agree, however, with the gentleman from Ohio, that the proceedings of the two conventions were entirely irregular. I was in Minnesota at their organization; and I think that the delegates who found themselves in a minority behaved as badly as freemen who ought to respect the rights of their fellow-men could behave, in bolting from the regular convention, and creating all the confusion and disturbance of a double-headed convention. The proceedings were certainly irregular, so far as legal forms are concerned; and if I agreed with gentlemen upon the other side, who hold that they can know nothing of the proceedings of the people of this Government, in any of its branches, except that which comes to them in the forms of law, I would resist the admission of Minnesota until she had complied with her enabling act. But I care nothing about that. Minnesota, by her popular voice, has fixed her organic law at the ballot-box.

Now, there are some provisions in this constitution which raise doubts in my mind whether Congress should admit the State. It fixes no limit to the term of existence of the present Legislature. The question arises in my mind, whether that government can be republican in which no limit is fixed to the term of service of its rulers. What are these life-institutions? If the government be republican which allows life-officers in all of its departments, cannot they adopt, like Louis Napoleon, the plan of having one election, and have the people say by that election that one person, and his posterity, shall be rulers for all time?

I have a single remark to make in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JENKINS,] and then I will leave this question. He said that it was a little singular that a Topekaite should oppose the admission of Minnesota because of irregularity in their proceedings, when we advocated Topeka, which was a rebellion. The gentleman's remark only shows his ignorance of the history of the two cases. The Topekaites, as the gentleman calls them, from the first to the present time, never proposed to supplant the territorial government without the approval of Congress. Such an intention is not in the record. I summon to the stand Governor Wilson Shannon, one of your own appointees, to prove that that was not their design. The free-State men of Kansas never, from the day the Territory was organized to this hour, proposed to subvert the territorial organization established by Congress, without the approval of Congress. Minnesota has already subverted your territorial organization, and her State Legislature are now making laws for that people—not under an act of Congress, but under the constitution which she sends here. Where is the President, with his Federal Army, to send to Minnesota to disperse that State Legislature, as he sent it to Kansas and dispersed her peaceable citizens, assembled to petition Congress for a redress of grievances?

I read from a dispatch from Wilson Shannon to William L. Marcy, Secretary of State, dated April 11, 1856. He says that that body, referring to the Topeka Legislature—

"met on the 4th of March last, and adjourned to meet again in July next, after a session of about ten days. The legislative action of this body was mainly prospective in its character, and looks forward to the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, or to future legislation before their enactments are to be enforced as law."

That, sir, was the character of the free-State Legislature in Kansas. They were resisting a despotic and cruel usurpation of all their legislative powers. They organized and petitioned you to relieve them from the grievances under which they suffered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is discussing Kansas affairs, when the bill is for the admission of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only referred to Kansas incidentally.

Mr. GROW. I am only replying to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JENKINS,] and showing that there is no inconsistency of action where he imagines an inconsistency to exist. The free-State men in Kansas did not, and never intend to, supplant the territorial organization without the consent of Congress. They have never resisted a law of this Government from the 4th of March, 1855, down to this very hour.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman has constantly referred to my remarks. I ask him whether his party never opposed the action of the Kansas Territorial Legislature?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would be giving a wide latitude to this debate, to go into these matters.

Mr. GROW. I hope the Chair will not interpose here. The gentleman asks me what I said, and surely he is entitled to the information which he seeks. I said the free-State party in Kansas never proposed to supplant the territorial government established by Congress, except by the consent of Congress.

Mr. JENKINS. Has not the gentleman's party denounced the acts of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas as a nullity?

Mr. GROW. Certainly we have; and we passed a law through this House, during the last Congress, to wipe them out of existence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must interpose and prevent the discussion straying further from the legitimate line.

Mr. GROW. Very well, sir; I will pursue that point no further. Minnesota has supplanted the territorial organization established by Congress. Nobody denies that but the Delegate from that Territory, who claims that that people are too loyal to rebel. I hope that he does not speak for that people, for I think the only reason they have not rebelled is because the President did not send the Federal Army there to trample their rights in the dust, and force a despotic usurpation upon them. I doubt not they would have rebelled if the wrongs had been inflicted upon them which have been inflicted upon Kansas. My good opinion of them would be greatly lessened if they would not. For, if ever the time shall come when any portion of the American people will not rebel against a cruel and tyrannical usurpation of all the powers of their Government, they are unworthy of their ancestry, and would bring a blush of shame to the cheek of their children. I do not believe that the people of Minnesota are of that character.

Minnesota has elected a Legislature under this constitution, and has enacted laws for the Territory. What has become of the Territorial Legislature? It is supplanted by this new government. The President sent his army to Kansas to disperse the members of the Topeka Legislature, who, as Governor Shannon said, only pretended to act prospectively, their acts to be subject to the approval of Congress; yet, why does not that same party which did that in Kansas, in order, as was said, to put down rebellion among its people, send an army into Minnesota, to vindicate the authority of the Federal Government there? I make no complaint that the people of Minnesota have done as they have in the meeting of their Legislature; but why not apply the same rule to her that you have applied to Kansas? for, if Kansas was guilty of any treason at all, it was only prospective, while that of Minnesota is actual; yet no army is sent against her people. While the Legislature may assemble at any time they please, they cannot enact valid laws until they have received the sanction of Congress, ratifying this constitution, which supplants the territorial government. Though any portion of the American people have a constitutional right peaceably to assemble, at all times, and petition Congress for a redress of their grievances, still they cannot establish a government, without the authority of Congress, to supplant a government established by Congress; otherwise, you would have a soleism in your Government—that the power that makes is not necessary to unmake. When Congress makes a government, under the Constitution, that government is paramount to all others, and can be supplanted by no other power than Congress itself. Therefore, to a certain extent, the people of Minnesota have usurped the powers of this Government. But is it for us to raise a question as to that, so long as the people themselves do not complain?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to call my friend's attention to one clause of this constitution. It provides for an election by joint ticket when the law requires them to elect in single districts.

Mr. GROW. That is true. There are two points in this constitution which I think are proper subjects for the consideration of Congress if they choose to exercise their power; for the exercise of all our powers are discretionary, and we may exercise them or not as we please. One point is the want of limit upon the time of holding office by the members of her Legislature; and the other is that which provides that members of Congress may be elected by general ticket, when the law of Congress requires their election by single districts. The question arises whether we will pass that by, and allow a general ticket to prevail over an express law of Congress. That is why I asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to allow me to offer an amendment to the effect that members of Congress should be elected by single districts, for I think it is the duty of Congress to see that their own laws at least are enforced. But neither of these points goes to the right of the people to ratify this constitution and send it here; but they are addressed to the discretion of this body, and may have weight here.

I have spoken much longer than I intended. My object was simply to express my views upon a few particular points touched upon by the gentleman who preceded me; and I desire to repeat a word or two lest in the confusion of the interruptions to which I have been subjected I may not have made myself fully understood. It is, that the people of any Territory of this Union, in my judgment, have the right at any time and at all times, to meet and form a constitution; and that that constitution, if ratified by a majority of the people at a fair election, is their will, and comes to Congress as their petition, like the petition of any other portion of the people, asking Congress to grant the prayer of the petitioners. I care not, therefore, what may be the forms which precede it.

It is a right which belongs to the people of the Territories, whenever they become sufficiently numerous to support a State government of their own, to have that form of government; and it then becomes the duty of Congress to take off the territorial government, and allow them a government of their own, so that they may manage their own affairs in their own way.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, obtained the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will give way, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion a moment, that I may move to have this bill for the admission of Minnesota printed.

Mr. HOWARD. I will.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the bill be printed. The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled, a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30th, 1859; when the Speaker signed the same.

MILITARY ROAD IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the completion of the military road from Fort Union to Santa Fé, in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—KANSAS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to make a personal explanation, and I ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield to me for that purpose. I will renew the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a personal explanation. In the Globe of Saturday last I find the following paragraph in the remarks made by my colleague [Mr. CAMPBELL] on Friday morning, on the report from the committee of conference. Owing, no doubt, to the "noise and confusion" prevailing in the Hall, I did not hear the remarks at the time, and I know my colleague did not intend to do me injustice:

"In addition to that—and I feel bound to allude to it, because I owe an apology to ninety one, so termed, Black Republicans—when the bill came from the Senate, an ar-rangment was made by members of all the old political parties, who were anxious to take this question forever from the Halls of Congress, to adopt, in substance, an amendment which had been proposed by a venerable and patriotic Senator from a slaveholding State, [Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky.] The friends of Mr. DOUGLAS were pledged, by those who were authorized to speak for them, as I understand, upon the high point of personal honor, to go for that proposition, with slight amendments agreed upon, to the last extremity, and to the bitter end of the controversy, and to vote for no other proposition. If I am mistaken in this allegation, the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS,] the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ADRAIN,] and others I might designate, will correct me now. Both of my colleagues [Messrs. COX and LAWRENCE] were understood to be in this arrangement."

I was in no such arrangement. Such a proposition was never made to me; and, so far as I know, not to any conference of anti-Lecompton Democrats. It was never so understood by me that I was "to go for that proposition [the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment] to the last extremity and to the bitter end of the controversy, and to vote for no other proposition." Such indefinite and wholesale pledges I never make. I voted for the Montgomery amendment because I preferred it to the Senate bill. I voted that the House insist upon said amendment; and, further, voted against a committee of conference. Upon the report from that committee when made, I was as free to act as my judgment might dictate, as though it had been a proposition ad initio.

While on the floor, I will further say that I never definitely made up my mind to vote for or against the conference report until Wednesday night last, and then in the quiet retirement of my own house, surrounded alone by my family. All intimations from any quarter prior to that time, regarding my vote upon said report, were premature and unauthorized by me.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not hear everything that my colleague said or read. I certainly had no purpose to misrepresent either of my colleagues, or to place them, or any other member, in a false position. I did say, and I repeat, that it was understood that both of my colleagues, with the other members of this House known as anti-Lecompton Democrats, did agree with those known as South Americans and Republicans that they never would yield, in the Kansas controversy, to any proposition which did not give to the people of that Territory the right to vote directly upon their constitution before the admission of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to say one word?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman, in his remarks the other day, made allusion to me, as I saw afterwards in the Globe. I did not hear it at the time he spoke, or I should have noticed it then. He stated that those Democrats who had acted against the Lecompton proposition of the Senate, had, as he understood it, made a pledge, in which their personal honor was involved, to stand by the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment to the bitter end, and vote for nothing else—go for nothing else. Now, I was never a party to any such arrangement as that; but I was willing to stand by that to the end of that. Though I was very far from approving some of its provisions, as an alternative I was willing to go for it, and to go for it as long as it was possible for me to support it; but I could have supported other propositions more agreeable to me than that. Whatever arrangement was made was made during my sickness, and I took no part in it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Illinois was sick at the time of the council to which I allude. The anti-Lecompton Democrats were represented by others.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. In reference to this discussion about pledges, I wish to say, in regard to myself, that I never was directly or indirectly a party to any pledge binding my action to the support of anything whatever. In my course, I have been controlled entirely by the dictates of my own judgment, and by nothing else whatever. I never did come into a pledge to the gentleman, or any member of his party, to support any measure whatever.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. One word further in regard to this proposition. While I gave no such promise to any gentleman, or to any caucus, I was prepared to pledge myself to go for nothing that would be a departure from principle.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will my friend from Ohio permit me to say a word here? I desire to state that I had a reluctance to giving my support to the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment; and I should not have done it, had I not distinctly understood, before I gave my vote, that at least twenty of those who were termed anti-Lecompton Democrats would, in any and every event, vote against any other proposition, or, I may say, any proposition which would be regarded by our side of the House as less favorable than this. My apprehension was so strong that there would be a backing down, knowing the history of previous transactions in Congress, that I meant to be satisfied beyond all doubt on the subject. In some conversations that I had with gentlemen, not of the Republican party, I understood them to say that they would vote for nothing else; that they would agree to no letting down in any way whatever; that they would at all times vote against a conference. Thereupon, that there should be no dispute as to the understanding, I sat down and drew up in writing what I understood to be a true statement of it. That paper I now have in my hand and will read it, with the consent of the House:

"1. Adopt Crittenden's substitute, with an amendment to the effect that the result of the elections, &c., shall be certified to the President by a majority of the commissioners."

I was afraid, Mr. Speaker, that there might be fraudulent voting and false returns and certificates, and I desired that this matter of voting and returns should be put beyond the control of either of the parties, and that we might be secure of fair dealing; therefore I insisted on that proposition.

"2. Vote for the bill if the substitute is adopted."

"3. If the Senate non-concurs in the amendment, insists upon its former vote, and asks a conference, the House will vote down a motion to insist, and immediately vote to adhere. If this shall be carried, reconsider and lay on the table."

I understood, of course, that that was to apply not only to the first vote, but to all votes. It was my understanding from the beginning that that programme was to be carried out to the end; for it is apparent that nothing would be gained if the agreement to adhere, and resist a conference, was to apply only to one or two votes, and gentlemen were then to be at liberty to vote for a conference, to recede, or abandon us in any stage of the proceedings. It was clearly understood that this arrangement was to hold as long as the bill was before the House. If I had believed that these Democrats would not stand with us to the end, I should not have given the vote I did. I believed that if they adhered, the Senate bill would be defeated; and I will state, that at a meeting at which I was present, this paper was read, and a copy of it was taken by an anti-Lecompton Democrat, who afterwards told me that his friends, (and others gave me the same assurance,) to the extent, at least, of twenty, would stand up to it under all circumstances.

Several MEMBERS. Who was that?

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the gentleman whether the South Americans were a party to the contract?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have stated all that I desire to say on that point.

Mr. RUFFIN. Who signed that?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to answer the question of my colleague?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly I will allow the gentleman to answer his colleague.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will say, for the edification of my colleague, and for whatever else he may get out of it—that I understood that proposition, and that I agreed to it. I will remark that, like the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] I did not understand that we were to go for no other proposition, but I did understand that we agreed to adhere to the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, and to stand to it to the close; and I think my colleague will do me the justice to say that I have fulfilled the bargain.

Mr. COMINS. Such was the understanding of every member on this side of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to make one solitary remark.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to say to the House, and to the country, that so far as my action was concerned in this matter, I had no compact, understanding, or agreement; I acted on my own sense of right, and from patriotic motives. I did that which I thought was right; and in doing that which I thought was right I rejoice that I coöperated with my colleague from Kentucky, and with many gentlemen on this side of the House, and I grieved that I could not coöperate with a large number of friends on the opposite side.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask the gentleman from Maine a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it a matter personal to yourself?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is to the whole House, I think. I understood the gentleman from Maine to say that an anti-Lecompton Democrat took a copy of that paper, which he read to the House. I wish to know who that gentleman is?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state to the gentleman—

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will answer that several anti-Lecompton Democrats saw the paper, and the one who took the copy afterwards stated that his friends knew of the paper, or of the understanding which it embodied. The gentleman said he had conversed with his associates, and that we might rely upon it that they would stand to this to the end, and agree to no conference and no lowering down. He said he had assurances of this, and could not be mistaken in regard to at least twenty of them. Other gentlemen gave me similar assurances, and I relied upon them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely want to know who took the copy?

Mr. WALBRIDGE, Mr. CLARK, of New York, and others, addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Ohio yield the floor? Will the gentleman relieve the Chair from embarrassment by signifying to whom he yields the floor?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am willing to yield to all who desire to come up and confess. I relieve the Chair of its embarrassment by designating my anti-Lecompton Democratic friend from New York [Mr. CLARK] first.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I wish the gentleman would state to whom he refers as the anti-Lecompton Democrat who undertook, in any manner, to commit his associates to any vote on any subject. I knew of no such commitment; and, for my part, I never made such a promise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would state that several persons were present when this paper was read. A copy was taken of it by an anti-Lecompton Democrat, who told me that at least twenty of his friends knew of the understanding, and agreed to vote in accordance with it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think I can tell the whole story in a very few words, without violating any confidence.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Will my friend allow me to correct a statement?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not now. I will repeat substantially what I said the other morning, when we were about to take the final vote on the bill to admit Kansas. A conference or council of gentlemen—members of this House—representing the Republican, the North American, the South American, and the anti-Lecompton Democratic elements, met, not in caucus, but to have a friendly interview, with the view of determining what was best to be done. The gentlemen were understood to have authority to negotiate and settle a programme for the defeat of any measure which did not secure the principle of popular sovereignty—the right of the people of Kansas to vote directly on the constitution which should govern her as a State.

The gentleman from Maine has stated the truth. That programme, as read by him, was agreed upon by those then present, with the distinct understanding that unless the ninety-two so-called Republicans agreed to it, unless at least twenty anti-Lecompton Democrats agreed to it, and at least six South Americans agreed to it, all parties were to be released from the obligation of the mutual understanding, and to be notified. As one of the parties to the arrangement, I have made a public apology to the ninety-two Republicans, who seem to have been betrayed, yet were true to their plighted faith.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. With the gentleman's permission, I desire to correct my former statement. Let me remark that the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, as it is called, was submitted to a meeting of anti-Lecompton Democrats, at which I was present, and it was understood that every man pledged himself to give it his support to the end.

Several MEMBERS. How many were present?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I cannot say. I kept my promise; and every promise, express or implied, which I have ever made, has been faithfully and explicitly performed.

Many voices on the Republican side of the House: "That is so."

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is certainly so. The gentleman from New York has my admiration of his fidelity. Neither my colleague from the central district, [Mr. Cox,] nor my colleague who has just made a personal explanation, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] ever gave to me, directly, any pledge whatever; but they were represented in that council by a committee of three, appointed, as I understood it, by the anti-Lecompton Democrats; and gentlemen upon this side of the House understood that there was at least a high moral obligation resting upon those who were thus represented—an obligation, Mr. Speaker, which, I think, was violated when the last vote was taken.

I said the other day that I was actuated by no unfriendly feelings towards either of my colleagues. I impugn the motives of no man upon either side of the House. I deemed it due to the truth of history in the closing scene of the struggle that the facts should be made known. I did not repeat any of the private conversations which I had with my colleagues. I had many such conversations with my colleagues and other Democrats, in their rooms and elsewhere, on the subject of this Lecompton movement; but I never will, as God is my judge, professing, as I do, to be a gentleman, I never will repeat private conversations.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask my colleague whether, in any conversation I ever had with him, incidental or otherwise, I ever gave him any such pledge?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Under no circumstances whatever can either of my colleagues or any other gentleman upon this floor with whom I may have had, in his chamber or in the presence of his family, private conversations in regard to this subject, extort from me one single word of any such conversation. It does not comport with my ideas of the duty of a Representative, to retail to this House and the world private conversations between gentlemen.

Mr. CLAY. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. As it is very evident that no more profit is to be derived from the prosecution of this subject at this time, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes after four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 5, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. A. HARRIS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BIGGS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. ASA BIGGS, inclosing a copy of a letter addressed by him to the Governor of the State of North Carolina, resigning the office of Senator of the United States from that State; which was read.

Mr. HUNTER. By the retirement of the Senator from North Carolina a vacancy is created in the Committee on Finance. I move that the vacancy be filled by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition of William A. Buckingham and other citizens of New London county, Connecticut, praying that a grant of land may be made to each State in the Union to endow therein an institution for the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLORY presented a petition of R. S. Simpson, assistant surgeon in the Army, praying compensation for professional services in the United States marine hospital at Key West; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate joint resolution (No. 4) to extend the operation of the act, approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 542) to authorize the vestry of Washington parish to take and inclose certain parts of streets in Washington city, for the purpose of extending the Washington Cemetery, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Washington county, in the District of Columbia, reported a bill (S. No. 316) to alter and amend an act entitled "An act conferring certain powers on the levy court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia," approved 1st July, 1812; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that an appropriation may be made for improving Boundary street, in Washington city, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed, by the Committee on the Judiciary, to report three bills for the purpose of protecting the public archives in California; for the prevention of frauds there; and to obtain the testimony of witnesses within the State of California by subpoena, where they reside in a different district from that in which suit is brought. I am instructed, also, to ask for their present consideration; because, if the bills are to pass, they ought to be passed at once. I do not think there can be objection to any of them. They came from the Department to me, and have been examined very carefully by the committee. I submitted them to the honorable Senators from California, and they are absolutely essential for the prevention of fraud there, and also for the protection of the public archives, and for obtaining some of them that are still outstanding. I hope the Senate will agree to consider the bills at once, as I do not think there can be any objection to them.

The bill (S. No. 313) to amend an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California;" the bill (S. No. 312) to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of public archives in the State of California; and the bill (S. No. 314) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California, were severally read the first time by their titles, and ordered to a second reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bills will now be read a second time. Mr. KING. I am not willing that they shall be considered until the reports are through with. I want to make some reports.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senator from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to their coming up after the reports are through; but until that is done, I think those who have reports to make ought to be allowed to make them. I wish to make a few, and after that, these bills may come up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. These bills cannot now be read a second time, objection being made.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom were referred seven petitions of officers of the militia of the State of Rhode Island, praying that further provision may be made for equipping the militia, submitted an adverse report.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Daniel J. Browne, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Frances Cato, widow of Burrell Cato, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Edward Merritt, reported adversely thereon.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to a uniform bankrupt law, and various memorials on the subject, have instructed me to report that they are unable to agree upon the terms of a bankrupt law, differing principally upon a cardinal question. A majority of the committee are opposed to any law embodying the system of voluntary bankruptcy. They ask, therefore, to be discharged from the further consideration of those memorials which have been presented for a relief law, as well as from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to the subject.

Mr. TOOMBS. The majority of the Judiciary Committee have reported against it, but two of the committee have concurred in the bill which I hold in my hand. I report it as embodying the views of the minority of the committee on the subject; and I ask to have the bill printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received by the Senate as the views of the minority. The question of printing goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GREEN. I object to its being received as the report of a bill from the minority of a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the form.

Mr. GREEN. An individual Senator may introduce a bill on leave, but the minority of a committee is a nonentity. A committee is a unit, and nothing but a majority of a committee can report a bill. By the courtesy of the Senate sometimes the views of a minority are received; but to allow them to come with the imposing character of a minority report, or a bill coming from a minority, is what, in legislative parlance, I do not understand, and I object to it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a slight mistake that I think he has committed. The question of printing this bill does not go to the Committee on Printing; for it is a bill introduced. In reply to the gentleman from Missouri, who wishes to introduce some new customs and practices in the Senate, I will say that the majority of the committee have reported that they cannot agree upon the reference made to them. The minority, however, have agreed, and therefore I submit this bill in accordance with the uniform rule of the Senate at all times. I shall not go into the question of the unity and indivisibility of committees; but according to the established practice of the Senate, a minority can report by bill or otherwise, on all questions. This has been the uniform and unvarying practice as long as I have sat here; and I believe very much longer. I submit to the Chair that the bill must be printed, as a matter of course; it does not go to the Committee on Printing. Certainly, the Senate can order it to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will make a statement. The Chair does not regard this bill strictly as a report from the committee. Reports from standing committees of the Senate are printed on motion; otherwise, the question of printing them would go to the Committee on Printing; but this being a bill introduced by a Senator, originating in Congress, will be printed without a motion to that effect.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not understand the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill being a bill originating in Congress under the rule, will be printed without going to the Committee on Printing, but will not be printed as a report from a standing committee of the Senate, according to the view of the Chair.

Mr. GREEN. The proposition which the Senator from Georgia makes is an individual proposition. No notice of it has been given to the Senate, and any one Senator can object to it as an individual proposition of another Senator. It is not the act of a committee. Now, if the Senator desires us to waive the rule for him as an individual, to introduce the bill, I am willing to waive it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not. I decline it being waived by the gentleman. I say I claim the right to present this bill as a minority report, in this case, by the usage of the Senate. I will not accept a waiver from my committee; I will take the judgment of the Chair and the Senate on the point.

Mr. GREEN. I deny his right to make a report of a bill, which bill was never referred to the committee. The subject of a bankrupt law was referred to the committee. The bill which has been sent to the desk was drawn by the Senator himself, I suppose; but no such bill was ever referred to the committee, and hence he is not reporting back a matter referred to the committee, nor could he report it back. Nothing but the majority of the committee constitutes the committee. All the rest are a nonentity, or a nullity, for legislative purposes.

But, so far as the right of the minority of a committee is concerned, it has no right. What right has a minority of the Senate, in a legislative point of view? the minority of the people, in a public point of view? the minority of committees, with reference to the rights of committees? None whatever; and the Senator cannot evade the rule of the Senate by saying: "I belong to a committee, and claim the right, therefore, as one of a committee, to introduce a bill contrary to the rules of the Senate." The rule of the Senate is, that no individual shall introduce a bill without giving previous notice; but that a committee may at any time report a bill during the morning hour. Now, he is not the committee. The committee report in a contrary direction. He has not asked to waive the rule requiring previous notice, and I therefore object to his bill being received at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question of the right of a minority of a committee to make a report was somewhat discussed during the pendency of the Kansas bill. The Chair gave the subject some investigation then, and came to the conclusion that a minority of a committee had not a parliamentary right to make a report; but that, according to the custom and usage of this body, it had been usual to receive their views as the views of the minority; and accordingly, when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] proposed to make a minority report from the Committee on Territories, the Chair received it as the views of the minority. The report of the committee, and the views of the minority, were ordered to be printed. In this particular case the question is somewhat new; but it occurs to the Chair to be proper that the views of the minority of the committee, as embodied in this paper, should be received according to the usage and custom of the Senate. The Chair does not consider it properly as a report from a standing committee of the body.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Chair a question. Does the Chair treat it as a bill?

Mr. HUNTER. Was a bill committed to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. GREEN. No, sir.

Mr. TOOMBS. The subject was.

Mr. HUNTER. But no bill?

Mr. TOOMBS. No, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I do not understand how a minority can report a bill.

Mr. GREEN. It cannot be done.

Mr. HUNTER. They can attain their object by introducing a bill on leave, without referring it; but I do not see how they can report a bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. It seems to me a little extraordinary that when a subject is referred to a committee, and two of the gentlemen composing the committee have agreed to report a bill, they should not be allowed to do so. Whether they submit a bill or a written report, makes no difference in parliamentary law. The Senator from Virginia says he does not see how they can report a bill. How can they report anything else, even their views as a minority? The bill is their report. One of my colleagues on the committee and myself have agreed to report a bill in conformity to the reference which has been made to us on the subject. I suppose it is unnecessary to argue the point unless an appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair; but I will say that according to the uniform custom of the Senate, the bill is before it from two of the committee. We claim no other sanction for it than that two of the committee to whom the subject was referred, have reported by bill.

Mr. GREEN. For the purpose of getting uniform practice I will take an appeal, because I want this question settled that we may know whether a minority can report against a majority.

Mr. PUGH. Perhaps we do not want an appeal. Let us understand the ground of the decision.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will allow me, I understand the Chair to have decided that this paper can be received by the Chair only as the views of the minority of the committee, by the courtesy and usage of the Senate. Well, I presume there is no appeal from that.

Mr. GREEN. If that is the case, there is no bill pending.

Mr. MASON. If it is proper, I would submit to the Chair the inquiry whether the paper, as I understand it to be in the form of a bill, will be received by the Chair as a bill, technically speaking, and go upon the Calendar?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MASON. Then there is no bill at all.

Mr. GREEN. If it is not received as a bill, I have no objection to the decision, and I will not appeal. If the paper does not go on the Calendar as a bill, very well.

Mr. TOOMBS. Where does it go?

Mr. GREEN. On the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that he did not consider this a report from a standing committee of the Senate, but he did not say that a minority of the committee might not present their views.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves that this paper be printed. If objected to by any Senator, it must lie over.

Mr. GREEN. If objected to, the motion must go to the Committee on Printing, because it is to print a paper which is merely the views of a minority, and does not go on the Calendar as a bill.

Mr. PUGH. I concur with the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, and I was about to propound the same inquiry when he interposed. I consider this paper as expressing the views of the minority, but I do not consider it a bill. I do not see how it can be read as a bill unless the Senator from Georgia brings it in individually as a bill; but I do not understand that the motion to print it must go to the Committee on Printing. We have heretofore printed the views of the majority and minority of a committee on an ordinary motion without a reference to the Printing Committee. This paper expresses the views of two members of the Committee on the Judiciary in the form of an enactment. It is no bill; we can never vote on it; nor can it be read, as I understand the decision of the Chair. The difference between this and the ordinary case where the views of a minority are presented, is, instead of giving us the argument on the subject, they have given us the form of an enactment. If it is to be received as a bill, I hope it will be printed, and in that case it will be printed anyhow; for if it is to come before us I intend to propose an amendment to strike out the voluntary clauses of the bill, and make it an involuntary bankruptcy.

Mr. BELL. Certainly, regularly it cannot be asked to be printed, but I hope it will be printed by unanimous consent. If other gentlemen feel any interest or curiosity to know what it is, I hope they will waive all objection to the printing, and the bill can be introduced, on leave, to-morrow morning. I hope there will be no objection to its being printed. It is not a bill on the Calendar. It can only be considered as expressive of the views of those two gentlemen on the committee. If there is no objection, I move that it be printed.

Mr. GREEN. There is objection.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope we shall dispose of this question.

Mr. STUART. It is disposed of.

Mr. BIGLER. No; it is not yet disposed of. It is a very important question. I am bound to differ entirely from the Senator from Georgia, and I think the body will see in a very few minutes that a step of this kind will lead to endless confusion. The other day we discussed a resolution proposing to instruct the Committee on Commerce to report a particular bill. Now, sir, if a minority of one or two on a committee have the right, against the will of a majority, to report bills and put them on the Calendar, where are we to stop? We destroy the entire system of business. It is the right of a majority to report on the subject-matter referred to the committee, and the minority to present their views, if they see proper; but if you allow a minority of one or two members on a committee to report a bill, and put it on the Calendar for the action of the body, you take from the majority the entire control. My friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] can report from the Committee on Commerce bills in every one of those instances, for the improvement of rivers and harbors, under this decision. Now, if this be a minority report, let it be printed as such, but not as a bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It appears to me that this discussion is really upon a very minute point. The majority of the committee have reported upon the subject of the introduction of a bankrupt law. The majority have reported that they have been unable to agree upon the details of a bill, and therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. The minority of the committee has agreed upon the details of a bill. That minority has framed a bill and brought it into the Senate. Now, if there is any objection to that, founded upon parliamentary law, I desire to put an end to it by giving notice that I shall introduce the bill to-morrow morning. ["Very well."]

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator desires it, I will waive my objection and allow the bill to be introduced to-day.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am much obliged to the Senator, and will accept his courtesy, and introduce it now.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; and it was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to make a motion to print two thousand extra copies of the bill presented by the Senator from Louisiana. We have calls for it all over the country, and the press ought to be supplied.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That must go to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope my motion will be received by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By the unanimous consent of the Senate, that order may be made. Is there any objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. POLK. I would not object to that, if I were convinced that there was any necessity for such a large number.

Mr. HAMLIN. That will not half supply the press, and the cost is comparatively trifling.

Mr. POLK. I suppose, then, the applications must come from the State of Maine. I do not think that a great majority of the people in the western States feel any interest in that matter, so as to require copies of the bill. I will not object to one thousand, but I think two thousand is too many, and I see no necessity for printing that number.

Mr. HAMLIN. I modify my motion so as to say one thousand.

The motion was agreed to.

OUTRAGES BY MEXICO.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to submit the following resolution of inquiry, and ask for its immediate adoption:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate if any and what measures have been taken for the protection of American commerce in the ports of Mexico, during the present distracted condition of that country; and especially whether any and what measures have been taken for obtaining redress for the recent outrages on American vessels, committed in the port of Tampico; and for protecting such vessels against a repetition of such outrages.

Mr. President, this resolution is directed to some recent occurrences that have taken place in the port of Tampico, during the pending revolutionary struggles in Mexico, and which seem to me to require some prompt action on the part of our Government. I will ask the Secretary to read two letters which have been addressed to me on the subject, and which I send to the desk. They will explain the nature of some of these outrages. The Secretary read the following letters:

TAMPICO, April 1, 1858.

DEAR SIRS: You will certainly think it very strange, that I should be here still; but unfortunate events have caused the detention of my vessel in this river, as you will perceive by the following narration: I arrived at this port on 28th February last; and owing to the state of siege of this city by Garza's troops, all the "cargadores" (stevedores) and canoe-men were taken up for soldiers. I had to engage any kind of men to discharge the vessel, taking ten days to do this work. On the 10th of March I began to load ballast of stone coal, (sold to me by General Moreno at an equal price as stone coal,) and on the morning of the 13th finished and got dispatched from the custom-house, shipped the money and some fruit. Owing to head winds, I was not able to go down the river until Tuesday, the 15th March, when about a mile below the city a fort of Garza's fired two cannon shot, which passed near the vessel. I dropped anchor, stopped for the sea-breeze, and returned immediately to my previous anchorage, came ashore, and protested before the American consul, Mr. Chase, who sent out to Garza a communication asking the reasons for firing into an American vessel. He answered that it was not at my schooner that the shots were aimed, but at an armed launch that was above me, (which was not so, as there was nothing before or behind,) and that my schooner could proceed down to the bar, and thence to sea, without being molested. On Saturday, the 20th, I got under way again, and arrived at the bar on the same day. I waited for the pilot next morning, and all day long, but no one came. On the 23d, an officer of Garza (Mr. Augustin Igura, formerly collector during Garza's government here), paid me a visit, wishing to search the vessel, which I refused openly, and told him I would not allow it under any circumstances; then he exacted the documents, and I told him that I was legally dispatched from the custom-house of Tampico, paid all the duties there, and desired to proceed to sea. He answered then that the vessel could not go out except I would pay the export duty on all the money I had on board; that the proper custom-house is at the bar, under the direction of Mr. Garza, and not in Tampico under Moreno. I sent up immediately an express to Mr. Chase, informing him of all what happened on board, and to protest in every way and manner. Captain Trevis, of the brig Statesen, arrived off the bar on the 30th, and came in on the same day. His vessel is detained there, and they won't allow her to come up. They exact all the duties, which Captain T. has nothing to do with. He has come up this morning with me, and we both have presented ourselves to Mr. Chase, and have done all that is required, and protested in full for all damages, losses, &c.

Mr. Chase has requested me not to venture to go to sea until this affair is settled, and particularly as Garza's employés do not allow the vessel to go out. Mr. C. has ordered a man-of-war to come here, and very likely will arrive here in a few days.

Excuse haste, and remain, dear sirs, yours very truly,
JOSEPH SBISA.

Messrs. BARELLI & Co., New Orleans.

TAMPICO, April 1, 1858.

DEAR SIR: By this opportunity I have only time to inform you that your schooner, Virginia Antonieta, Captain Sbisa, after having been legally cleared from the custom-house of this port, got under way on the 18th ultimo for New Orleans, but when sailing past one of Garza's batteries, two cannon-shot were fired at that vessel, though she had her national colors hoisted at her fore and main topmast heads.

She then retraced her course to the anchorage off this city, and on receiving the captain's report, immediately dispatched a courier to Garza, with a copy of the captain's protest against the insult to our flag, and an official letter which I addressed to that revolutionary chief. His answer was vague and unsatisfactory; but he distinctly stated that the American vessels in port might proceed to sea without molestation. Accordingly Captain Sbisa proceeded to the bar, which is now in the hands of Garza, where a demand was made of Captain Sbisa for double duties, both import and export, and also double port charges, which was properly refused on the part of the captain, and hence the vessel is detained by an armed force under orders from Garza. By this conveyance I have written for a vessel of war. I trust you will use your influence with our Government to send one here with the least possible delay. Our city is cannonaded three times every day by Garza, and every shot is directed on our private dwellings. Yesterday morning one shot passed through the house of the French consul, and he and his lady narrowly escaped being killed. I passed three sleepless days and nights, which renders it rather a difficult task to attend to the duties of my office.

I remain, with much regard, your most obedient servant,
FRANKLIN CHASE.

J. A. BARELLI, Esq., New Orleans.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

JONAS P. LEVY.

Mr. IVERSON. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the decision of the Court of Claims in the case of Jonas P. Levy, have instructed me to report it back and ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration; and that it be referred to the committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. MASON. I object to the reference. My recollection is that that memorial was before the Committee on Foreign Relations at this session, and they were discharged from its consideration, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

If the Committee on Claims wish to be discharged, it had better lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN. I presented the memorial, and my recollection is that I had it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MASON. That committee was discharged, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I suppose it had better lie on the table.

Mr. IVERSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STUART. I want that case to go on the Calendar, so that it will stand as an adverse report from the Court of Claims. Then it will get the action of the Senate. There ought to be some time when a case is ended. I have seen several cases that have been handed about, referred to one committee, and then to the court, and then again to a committee here. It is a species of engineering by which we shall never end anything; and inasmuch as this case has been returned from the Court of Claims, I desire it to go upon the Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate. The Senator from Georgia withdrew his motion.

Mr. IVERSON. I renew the motion with the view to make an explanation. The claimant in this case informed me this morning that he had presented a memorial to the Senate on this subject which had been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was important that the committee should have the papers in the case before them in order to a correct understanding of the case; and therefore he desired me to have the papers referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which had before been referred to the Committee on Claims. It is simply to give the Committee on Foreign Relations an opportunity of investigating the memorial which he has previously presented.

Mr. MASON. I will not object further. Let it go.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, for the relief of the widow of Captain William Lewis Herndon. If the Senate mean to do anything in that case, it is time it should be done.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have no objection to the consideration of that resolution, and I shall vote for it when it comes up; but I ask the Senator to give way for a few minutes, to permit the Senator from Delaware to take up the three bills he reported this morning for California. They can be considered and disposed of in a very few minutes. I believe they will give rise to no debate.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will suffer these bills to be considered. I am in favor of his joint resolution; but these bills are public matters that really ought to be passed.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my motion for the present. I am always accommodating.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to take up the bills I reported this morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 313) to amend an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that if, in any case pending in the United States district courts in California, on appeal from the land commissioners, either party shall desire to examine a witness residing in any other district within that State, or shall require the production of any paper, written instrument, book, or document, supposed to be in the possession of a witness residing in another district, the court in which the case is pending, being satisfied, by affidavit or otherwise, of the materiality of such witness, or of the production of such paper, written instrument, book, or document, as evidence in the case, may order the clerk to issue a subpoena, or a subpoena duces tecum, which shall run into any other district of California, and be served by the marshal of either district, as the court may direct.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. No. 312) to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of public archives in the State of California, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be collected and deposited in the surveyor general's office in California, all official documents, papers, instruments of writing, archives, official seals, stamps, and dies, that may be found in the unauthorized possession of any individual, relating to and used in the administration of government and public affairs in the department of Upper California during the existence of Mexican and Spanish authority there. It imposes heavy penalties on the concealment, purloining, abstracting, and counterfeiting such papers or documents.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (S. No. 314) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to make it a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not less than three, nor more than ten years, and a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, for any person to falsely make, alter, forge, or counterfeit, or cause to be falsely made, altered, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly to aid and assist in falsely making, altering, forging, or counterfeiting any petition, certificate, order, report, decree, denouncement, concession, deed, patent, confirmation, design, map, expediente, or part of an expediente, or any title papers, or evidence of right, claim, or title to lands, mines, or minerals in California for the purpose of setting up or establishing against the United States any claim, right, or title to lands, mines, or minerals in California. Any person who shall procure or assist in procuring any such paper to be falsely dated, or who shall sign his name to any such false paper purporting to sign it as the name of an officer, or who shall present any such falsely-dated paper, is to be subject to the same penalties.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall not interfere with the special order to-day, but I give notice that tomorrow I shall move to take up the Military Academy appropriation bill. It will not take long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will first bring the order of business to the attention of the Senate. Yesterday, it was called to the attention of the Chair that the joint resolution for the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding was an older special order than the bill in regard to fishing bounties. The Chair had an impression on the subject, and said to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] that he would look into the matter by this morning. He has done so, and finds that in January last the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Doolittle] was, upon the motion of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Mason,] postponed to, and made the special order for, the same day and same hour with the report, resolutions, and bill, from the Committee on Foreign Relations. There have been one or two discussions upon them since, and they have been postponed. The Chair is satisfied, on an examination of the subject, that the day having passed to which they were last postponed, without any action having been taken, they fall back to their relative places on the Calendar, and that the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin is the oldest special order, and must now be called up unless postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. For the purpose of taking up a little resolution which was laid aside at the suggestion of the Senator from California this morning, I move to postpone the special orders. If the Senate mean to pass the joint resolution for Mrs. Herndon, it is time they should do so. If they mean to reject it, that should be known.

Mr. CLAY. I trust the special order will not be postponed. If, however, that resolution will not occupy any time of consequence, I shall not object.

Mr. SEWARD. If it occupies time, we will let it go over.

Mr. CLAY. If there is to be no debate on it, I shall not object.

Several Senators. There will be no debate.

Mr. SEWARD. We do not mean to interfere with your special order.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

COMMANDER HERNDON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 32) for the benefit of the widow of Commander William Lewis Herndon, United States Navy, which is in these words:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress entertain a high sense of the devotion to duty, the coolness, courage, and conduct of Commander William Lewis Herndon, United States Navy, in command of the steamer Central America, at sea during the prevalence of a hurricane on the 12th of September, 1857; and that the widow of the said William Lewis Herndon be entitled to receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to three years' full sea-service pay of a commander in the Navy.

Mr. IVERSON. I had intended, when this resolution was presented before, to debate it at some length; but, since that, appeals have been made to me from such a quarter as have induced me to waive any elaborate investigation or objection to the proposition. I shall simply content myself with saying that, according to my notions of the Constitution and the powers which are conferred upon this Government by the Constitution, the Congress of the United States has no more right to take $7,500 out of the Treasury, and make a naked, unconditional gift of that amount to this lady, however high her merits may be, or however strongly upon the gratitude of the country her husband may have had claims, than it has to take the same amount of money out of the Treasury, and put it in the bottom of the river that runs near us. That is my idea of the constitutional power of Congress; and I could not vote for a proposition of this sort, making this naked and unconditional grant, according to my notions of constitutional power, without inflicting on my conscience the stain and sting of perjury. Other gentlemen doubtless entertain different views in relation to the constitutional power of Congress, and therefore will vote for the resolution. I shall not go into any lengthy discussion of the subject. If I were to do so, I could, I think, present views which would justify me, and others who believe with me, in resisting the passage of the resolution. Still, I will forbear under the peculiar circumstances of the case. I rose merely to express my dissent from the proposition, and to ask that the yeas and nays may be taken on the final passage of this resolution, in order that I may put my negative upon the record.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time; and the question was stated to be, Shall the resolution pass?

Mr. IVERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SLIDELL. As I am a member of the Naval Committee that reported this resolution, and shall vote against its passage, I wish to state, very briefly, my reasons. Captain Herndon, no doubt, behaved very gallantly on the occasion of the loss of the Central America, in a manner to excite the admiration of the whole people of the United States; and if there were any precedent for extending this bounty to his widow, I should very cheerfully vote for it. She enjoys now a pension—I do not know how much—commensurate with his grade in the Navy.

Mr. POLK. Can the Senator state how much it is?

Mr. SLIDELL. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can state.

Mr. MALLORY. About three hundred dollars a year, I think.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am discharging now a very painful duty, one extremely unpleasant to me; but, being a member of the committee, I think it right to give my reasons for not supporting the report. The greatest extent to which the gratuity of the Government has ever been extended to the widows of officers who have perished in battle or have been lost at sea, has been, I believe, one year's pay. To that extent I should be prepared to go now; but inasmuch as it is very much extended—extended beyond the previous bounties of the Government—I shall be compelled, most reluctantly, to vote against it, paying, as I do, at the same time, a most heart-felt tribute to the high character, magnanimity, and courage of Captain Herndon.

Mr. MALLORY. I will not discuss this resolution, for I want it to pass; but will confine myself to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, that it is without precedent.

The resolution, sir, is consistent with the practice of this Government for many years past, and I will refer to but a few cases to show it. In 1817, Congress voted six months' pay to the widows, or the children, parents, brothers, and sisters of the officers and crew of the United States ship Epervier, lost at sea. In 1830, Congress gave the same in the case of the United States ship Hornet, lost at sea. In 1833, Congress gave the same in the case of the Sylph, lost at sea. In 1816, Congress gave twelve months' pay in the case of the United States ship Wasp; and in 1855, Congress gave twelve months' pay in the case of the Albany. In the present case we follow the principles established by these cases, but extend the time. But one individual, the widow of Herndon, will receive the benefit of the resolution. I forbear further remarks, in the hope of having the vote at once.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to say a very few words in support of this resolution. In ordinary circumstances I should not be disposed to go beyond the precedents that have hitherto been set by Congress in such cases; but I do consider this case well entitled to be regarded an exception. This is the case of an officer in the performance of a public duty, in the line of duty to which he was ordered by the Secretary of the Navy, not merely hazarding his life in battle, not simply losing it by shipwreck, but deliberately sacrificing his life for the safety of the women and children who were committed to his charge. Under the circumstances which attended that shipwreck, no man who has read the details can doubt that the gallant officer who stood upon his deck, and sent those people that were confided to his care to a safe refuge on board the vessel lying near, did so with a knowledge that his life was to fall a sacrifice to his devotion to their safety. His conduct on that occasion created a thrill of admiration and gratitude in every American heart. It is not the ordinary case of a man losing his life in battle. There, sir, is the excitement, the desire of glory, the loss of all sight of danger resulting from the combat itself, when all notions in relation to self-preservation give way to excitement, and when men have before them the hopes of fame, of advancement in their profession, and of reaping in their own lives the reward of gallantry they display. This man sank into the grave, coldly, calmly, deliberately offering up his life as a sacrifice to duty.

I think, sir, that it is a very uncommon case. I believe that nothing hitherto of the kind has been done. If the passage of this resolution is to be refused, upon the ground that there has been no precedent, I think we shall be acting not well nor wisely. It is a case in which it is our duty to set the precedent; and I hope to God, sir, that whenever such cases may hereafter occur, the precedent will be followed. I hope that what the American Congress may do on this occasion may encourage other men to sacrifice their lives for the preservation of those whose safety is committed to their charge. Let us make this precedent. All the American people will ratify our act.

I have said all that I intended to say on the subject. I do not think this a case in which we ought to appeal to a former act.

Mr. CLAY. I must insist on taking up the special order. ["Oh, no!" "Question!"]

Mr. SEWARD. Let us take the question.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator from New York is going to make a speech—

Mr. SEWARD. I have but a word to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This resolution was taken up on motion by a vote of the Senate, and is properly before the body.

Mr. CLAY. But it was with the understanding that there should be no debate.

Mr. SEWARD. This matter was not brought before the Senate by Mrs. Herndon, but I brought it forward simply on the recollection of a single incident which occurred to my mind, and that was that the last that was known of this gallant officer, was the testimony of one of his passengers, that when his wife and children were sent ashore by him safe, and he took leave of Captain Herndon, he took from his pocket his watch, and gave it to him, and told him to carry it to his wife. That was the estate which he left to her.

Mr. IVERSON. I submit to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I wish to know whether there were any seamen or privates on that vessel who were lost under the same circumstances?

Mr. MALLORY. No other that I know of. Captain Herndon was a commander in the Navy, and assigned to that duty under orders of the Secretary of the Navy in conformity with law—the only naval officer on board the ship.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask whether the officer thus assigned received pay for the service he rendered outside of what he got as an officer of the Navy?

Mr. MALLORY. I cannot answer that question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Green, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Slidell, and Toombs—8.

So the resolution was passed.

RELATIONS WITH PARAGUAY.

Mr. BAYARD. I rise to what I believe is a privileged question. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday amending the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in reference to our difficulties with Paraguay. I voted in the affirmative, in favor of that amendment, but at the time was engaged in drawing an amendment to another bill, and was under a misapprehension, supposing that I was voting against the amendment. I move a reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the motion to be entered, or to be acted on now?

Mr. BAYARD. I want to enter the motion now. I do not care when the Senate consider it.

Mr. MASON. The resolution was laid on the table. I suppose it ought to be taken up for the purpose of entering the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes it will be sufficient to enter the motion to reconsider, without a formal taking up of the resolution.

Mr. MASON. Very well.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I beg leave to inquire of the Chair, who has been examining the special orders, as I learn, where, according to his research, is the bill concerning French spoiliations? It has been a very long time a special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to state to the Senator when that special order will be reached. There are other special orders in advance of it, and it will depend entirely on the action of the Senate in regard to them. It comes up as a special order according to the date at which it was assigned.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish the Secretary would send me a memorandum of its place.

Mr. FESSENDEN, and others. It will be found on the first page of the Calendar.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first special order is the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the consideration of that until to-morrow, in order that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] may proceed with his remarks on the fishing bounties bill.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next special order is before the Senate.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask to be discharged from further service on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLAY. I would rather that that motion would lie over. I should be inclined myself to object to the Senator being discharged.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope it will be acted on now unless the gentleman has some reason why the Senate should not consider it now.

Mr. CLAY. I hope no other reason than that of the public service which the Senator may render. I dislike to see him discharged from that committee. I hope the motion will lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. You have a right to object.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think this comes within no rule of postponement. It is a motion which can be considered at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is, that when a special order is called up, the Senate shall then proceed to consider it unless it be postponed by vote of the Senate. The Chair thinks it would require general consent to entertain now the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TOOMBS. The gentleman gave way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Still it requires general consent.

Mr. TOOMBS. It makes no difference to me whether it be acted on now or not. I give notice that I shall not serve.

COD FISHERIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next special order is the bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries, which is now under consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, under ordinary circumstances, under almost any other circumstances, I should ask the indulgence of the Senate for a postponement of this bill until a subsequent day. It is a question in which the people whom I represent are deeply interested; and laboring, as I am, under an indisposition, I think I might even now be justified in asking the Senate to postpone the consideration of this bill to another day. But, sir, I am aware that the day of our adjournment has been determined upon, and I am unwilling to interpose any objection of mine; I am unwilling to ask any indulgence of the Senate which shall in any manner tend to procrastinate the day of adjournment of this body. I will, therefore, make the attempt to proceed, although I am deeply sensible that in what I have to suggest to the Senate on this occasion, I shall hardly be able to do the question that justice which I should like to do if I were in full health.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator that, if he feels indisposed, I shall move to take up the Military Academy appropriation bill, and go on with that to-day, so as to give him until to-morrow. I will consult his pleasure.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I should be very glad indeed to yield to his suggestion; and, if it meets the approbation of the Senate, I will do so very cheerfully. I do not wish, however, to pursue any course which shall seem to delay the action of the Senate in any way. If the action of the Senate can be as properly devoted to that bill to-day, I should much prefer to address the Senate on this question to-morrow.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill making appropriations for the Military Academy.

Mr. CLAY. I am not willing to force the Senator from Maine to speak to-day, complaining, as he does, of indisposition; and therefore I shall make no opposition to the postponement; but I trust that the Senators who advocate this bounty will to-morrow be willing to take up the bill, and that we shall proceed with it continuously until we get a vote. I want it disposed of. We may, perhaps, dispose of it to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved and seconded that this and other orders be postponed, in order to take up the Military Academy appropriation bill.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

It proposes to make the following appropriations:

For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, $94,886.

For pay of eight professors at the Military Academy, $16,000.
 For commutation of subsistence, $3,066.
 For forage for officers' horses, $864.
 For current and ordinary expenses, as follows: repairs and improvements, fuel, and apparatus, forage, postage, stationery, transportation, printing, clerks, miscellaneous and incidental expenses, and departments of instruction $33,610.
 For gradual increase and expense of library, $1,000.
 For expenses of the Board of Visitors, $3,000.
 For forage for artillery and cavalry horses, $8,640.
 For supplying horses for cavalry and artillery practice, $1,030.
 For barracks for dragoon detachment, $1,530.
 For barracks for artillery detachment, $6,500.
 For purchase of a bell, and mounting the same with the clock on one of the public buildings, $450.
 For repairs to officers' quarters, $500.
 For models for the department of cavalry, $250.
 For extension of water pipes and increase of reservoir, $2,500.
 For targets and batteries for artillery exercise, $150.
 For gas pipes and retorts, extension of cadets' new hall, academic hall, and other public buildings, $9,500.
 For stables for dragoon and artillery horses, $2,468.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out:

"For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, $94,886.
 "For pay of eight professors at the Military Academy, $16,000."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians, $112,806.

Mr. HUNTER. The reason for the amendment I will state very briefly. The annual estimate was $112,806, as the committee propose now to make the appropriation. This includes an addition of $240 per annum to each of the professors, which has been accorded to them by a decision of the War Department, under our bill increasing the pay of the Army. There is a section in that bill, passed February 21, 1857, providing that—

"From and after the present fiscal year, the pay of each commissioned officer in the Army, including military storekeepers, shall be increased twenty dollars per month, and the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be twenty cents per ration."

The Department has, I believe uniformly, decided that these professors are commissioned officers, and therefore entitled to this increase of pay. In the House of Representatives it seemed to be supposed that they were not commissioned officers and did not come under the law, and they struck out this addition of $240 per annum to their salaries. The Committee on Finance recommend that it be restored, to make it correspond with the estimates, and correspond with the decisions of the Department for some time past.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia, if he means to include professors who are not officers of the Army?

Mr. HUNTER. According to the decision of the Department all the professors at the academy are officers of the Army.

Mr. PUGH. Most of them are not entered on the Army list as officers of the Army. They are simply employes of the Government. I think the Department is wrong, and the House of Representatives is right.

Mr. HUNTER. Here is a statement of the case, which can be read, if the Senator desires to hear it.

Mr. PUGH. I do not care about the statement. I wish to know whether the fact is that it is proposed to give this additional pay to professors who are not officers of the line or staff of the Army in the ordinary acceptance of the term?

Mr. HUNTER. It is designed to give the professors the additional pay, on the ground that they are commissioned officers of the Army. They hold commissions, and are regularly commissioned as officers. Such has been the decision of the War Department, and of the Attorney General. If the Senator desires it, here is a statement of the case.

Mr. PUGH. I do not want to hear it. I am certain it is wrong. That is my opinion.

Mr. IVERSON. I wish to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee a question. We had before us some time ago—two sessions ago, I think—an application to raise the pay of Professor Jauon, who was professor of the sword exercise in the Military Academy. He was no more an officer than any one on this floor.

Mr. HUNTER. He is not included.

Mr. IVERSON. I think he is one of the professors now. They are no more officers of the Army than I am.

Mr. HUNTER. He does not come in under this provision. He is master of the sword, and gets $1,500. Only the professors get this increase.

Mr. HALE. Is this question on a substitute for the whole bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART.) It is a simple amendment, as the Chair understands it.

Mr. HUNTER. It is an amendment to one clause merely, giving $240 additional.

Mr. HALE. I am opposed to it. I wish to submit some remarks on the whole bill, but I suppose it is hardly in order here.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I have but very little to say; but what I propose to say, if it has no other merit, will be very plain. I first took a seat in the Federal Congress fifteen years ago; and one of the first votes I gave was against any appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point. I voted in direct obedience to the instructions of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, which had passed resolutions instructing her Senators, and requesting her Representatives, to go against all appropriations to that academy. Those instructions coincided with the deepest convictions of my understanding. They have been growing stronger every one of the fifteen years; and if nothing else has been effected by the history of this session, I may say that these convictions have become crystallized by the action that has taken place here at this session. There are some facts which I want to state here, and I want the country to understand them; and they shall, so far as what I say here will enable them to understand them.

I take it, sir, that by the decided action of this Government, the President and Senate, this academy is a nuisance, and useless; and I will tell you why. In 1853, a class entered there, that was to graduate in July, 1857. A large majority of the class stayed and graduated, some of them with very distinguished honor, from different sections of the country. One of them, a young man who stood at the head of the class, was the son of a gentleman who was a colleague of mine on the floor of the other House. There were three young men in that class who found it very inconvenient work, and they finally dropped off, some of them at the end of six months. There is a very trying season for West Point Cadets at the end of the first six months, and one or two dropped off then, or were allowed to resign, and the academic board, who had the examination of them, recommended that they be not permitted to come back; and I think, before the year was out, their number increased to three. These young men, who could not go through the academy, who were dropped and left out, occupied their time as they pleased four years, whilst the class, consisting of fifty or sixty, continued in the academy, and, by hard study, and a vigorous and faithful performance of all the duties required of them, morally, physically, and intellectually, occupying the very highest places, finally graduated. That whole class was, however, passed by, and passed over by the President of the United States, and these three—I was going to say yearlings, but they did not come up to that—these half-yearlings, these six months' boys, that could not stand the test, and, as a matter of grace were allowed to resign, with a recommendation that they should not come back, by the action of the President and Senate, have been taken up and put at the head of the fifty or sixty who labored through the whole four years.

Now, sir, what did we do that for? What did the Senate do it for? We did it because we thought that an education at the Military Academy was not requisite to make a good officer. It was the deliberate judgment of the Senate and of the Government, that a boy had better be out of the academy than in it, because those who stayed and won its highest honors; those who labored by the midnight lamp, and toiled for four years in the painful and tedious ascent to such merit as they might acquire, were all passed by, ignored, put aside, and those semi-yearlings who were dropped for incompetency, and whom the academic board recommended should not be allowed to return, have been taken up by us, put at the head, and made to rank every one of their class. Now, if a boy can better qualify himself for a commission in the Army by staying out of the academy than by staying in it, let us turn them all out, let us abolish the institution.

Again, sir, I say that to have an institution thus managed, and commissions in your Army thus conferred, exhibits a degree of favoritism, of partiality, and of—I do not know what to say—of injustice, that ought to condemn its administration, and it is unworthy of the support of the people, and ought not to be tolerated. The whole system is wrong, utterly wrong, totally wrong, entirely wrong. Why have we got to educate these scions of the Army at the public expense? Why educate them in preference to any other class of young men? I am opposed to it, and I am also opposed to the Naval Academy, though I do not know that the Government has solemnly decided that boys can better qualify themselves to be sailors by staying out of the Annapolis school than they can by staying in it; but that has been the deliberate judgment of the Senate and of the Government in regard to the Military Academy; and for that reason, if for nothing else, I am entirely and utterly opposed to any of these appropriations.

Besides, sir, whenever you have occasion for an army and men to command it, you do not go to West Point to get them—never. When you wanted a man to command your army to go to Mexico, you went to New Hampshire; you went into a very respectable bar there, and took one of our first rate country lawyers, and you made him a general right off, sent him to Mexico, and there he distinguished himself so above all his fellows, West Point men and all, that nothing would do but you must, in consideration of his distinguished services, make him President of the United States. What West Point boy have you ever served in that way, sir? [Laughter.]

All these facts go to show that West Point is utterly useless. We have the judgment of the Senate and the judgment of the country that men can better qualify themselves for subordinate places in the Army by spending their time anywhere else than at West Point, and you can get better generals out of a New Hampshire law shop than you can out of a Military Academy at West Point, and as long as this is the case, what is the use of supporting it any longer?

I am willing that the vote shall be taken, but I simply want the yeas and nays, so that it may be seen how many there are who are for supporting a useless institution, which disqualifies men for places in the Army, when the fiction by which it is sustained is that it qualifies them. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the Senator from New Hampshire has taken but a partial view of this subject. I do not think he has taken a fair and candid course with it. I am not a particular advocate for the Military Academy. Its benefits may be partial, and there may be partiality in the administration of its affairs. The gentleman, in condemning those young men who were appointed lieutenants in the Army, appears to have taken a very partial view. He has calculated the disadvantages, the toil, the labor, the vigilance of those who have pursued their studies regularly at the institution; but he has not calculated the advantages on the other hand that have resulted to the Government from these delinquents, as he charges them with being. Why, sir, he ought to recollect, as I believe he is an advocate for retrenchment and economy, that these young men, by leaving the institution, saved to the Government a very considerable sum. The Government had not to support them after they left there, while it was taxed for the support and sustentation of those who remained at the institution. I really think if they are capable and efficient men who have been ingrafted upon the Army, they are entitled to credit, rather than discredit, from the fact of their having become useful and active soldiers and officers, without the same expense to the Government that others have incurred. I can, therefore, see no reason for condemning these young men for being placed in the Army when their capacity generally was not objected to. I do not think the scientific force altogether important in the Army; for I think the most efficient soldiers I have ever seen were boys who were taken from the plow-handle, young men who had been employed in active life, who had a knowledge of human nature, and the practical affairs of life, and who never delved into the profundity of abstract sciences. They are the efficient soldiers, and whenever it is tried, they will be found the main reliance of the country.

I think the Senator from New Hampshire is disposed to be harsh with the young men to whom he alluded. If they have individual merits apart from their character as students and successful scholars, that would entitle them to the confidence of the Executive and of the Senate. I can see no impropriety in the President appointing them, and in the Senate sanctioning their appointment. If the Senator will suggest any remedy to supply the place of the Academy, or to abolish it entirely, I may view it with great deliberation, because I do not think it is necessary to have such an institution under the peculiar patronage of the Government. I have never seen any advantages result to the country from it that justified it; and though there are gentlemen of merit there as professors, proficient in their science, I doubt very much whether the extent to which it is carried there is necessary to every officer constituting the Army of the United States. Practical men, and not martinetts who are educated in all the routine and formula of military life, are to be relied on as efficient officers when you bring them into the field. But, sir, I shall not detain the Senate.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Douglas, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hamlin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Sillidell, Stuart, Wilson, and Yulee—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Doolittle, Durkee, Hale, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, Pugh, Trumbull, and Wade—9. So the bill was passed.

RELATIONS WITH PARAGUAY.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Oregon.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator will allow me to have precedence of the floor, and call up first the joint resolution in reference to the difficulties with Paraguay. I take it for granted, from what has passed, that there will be no debate on it. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday. Let the vote on the reconsideration be taken, and if it is not reversed, it will end the matter. If it is reversed, the resolution will, no doubt, be passed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If it will not lead to debate, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MASON. I move to take up the joint resolution to which I have referred.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 28) for the adjustment of difficulties with the Republic of Paraguay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.]

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations a single question. Does he not mean to press the resolution if the amendment of the Senator from Vermont prevails?

Mr. MASON. I should not press it in that event, because I am satisfied that the President has all the power now, by his general executive office, that he would have if the resolution were to pass with this amendment.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which is in line eight, to strike out the words, "and use such force," so that the clause will read:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to adopt such measures as in his judgment may be necessary, &c.

Mr. MASON. The President of the United States, by virtue of his office under the Constitution, conducts our intercourse with foreign nations, and therefore he has ample authority, without any express law, through the functionaries of the Government who are in that quarter of the world, to make representations at this Republic if he thinks proper. If, therefore, the amendment prevails by which he is prohibited from making a demonstration of force, if the reparation which is demanded be not given, I consider that the resolution would be perfectly useless, and of course should not press it. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. COLLAMER. Inasmuch as this is an amendment which I proposed, I desire briefly to state the reason why I offered it. It is true that the President of the United States has the conduct of our foreign affairs, and undoubtedly can, and, as he says, will, apply to Paraguay for the redress of grievances and wrongs; yet I say that it is unprecedented in this Government to authorize the President, in the first instance, by an act of Congress to use force for the purpose of procuring redress. I know that it is a power which he has exercised in relation to savage people, but not in relation to a people with whom we have held intercourse, with whom we have made treaties; who are a civilized people, or recognized as such. To allow the President to use force for the purpose of obtaining redress and procuring satisfaction for wrongs, he being the judge alone of that satisfaction, is unprecedented in the Government; no such thing can be found.

Now, I am somewhat astonished at the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations seeming to press this point so much. I have insisted that this is war. He says it is hostility, not war. Well, I should like to see the writer who makes the distinction between war and hostility. I should like to know in what it consists, if there is any difference. Presidents have thought proper to ask for force on former occasions. I believe it was asked a few years ago in relation to Granada. A variety of propositions of this kind have been presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and certain it is that the course taken by the honorable chairman of that committee has been highly conservative all the time. No new projects, no hair-brained adventures have been presented to us from that source at all; but this seems to be persisted in, and it seems to me to be inconsistent with the precedent course of the honorable chairman, and with the whole practice of our Government hitherto. Why is it that the President asks this? Paraguay has never been asked to make reparation to us for the wrong complained of. He says he will ask it. Very well; then the time has not yet come for using force. Why does he come here at all? It is, I apprehend, because the case is of such a kind that he would be unwilling to use force unless the authority to do so was voted by Congress; and it is therefore proposed to make it a joint resolution, so that it shall be an act of Congress like an act of war, Congress alone having the power to declare war.

Why may not the usual and ordinary course be taken? Gentlemen seem to have supposed that I am opposed to obtaining satisfaction. Not at all. But it is said Paraguay is a weak Power, and we are in no danger if we do get into war. That is so; but it is a dangerous precedent. Why not then pursue the usual and ordinary course—ask them for satisfaction for whatever wrongs there are, see whether they make excuse? In regard to the firing into the Water Witch, it may be asked whether they disavow that, whether, having been done by an officer of theirs, they would make redress, and if so, what redress? So, too, in relation to the confiscation of property of some of our citizens, negotiations may be held.

My objection to this is not that I would not use force when the proper time came, when the occasion called for it, but Congress should be the judge, not the Executive. Let the Executive endeavor to succeed in a negotiation. If he does not in that way obtain the satisfaction which he thinks proper, let him come to Congress; if he does obtain it, a treaty will be made, satisfaction will be given and accepted. If, however, negotiation fails, if the satisfaction tendered is not that with which we ought to be satisfied, let him lay the facts before Congress, that we may see and judge whether the occasion for war has arisen—that is, whether the occasion is one ripe for the use of force, for that is war.

My amendment is simply asking you to pursue the usual and ordinary course; but the original resolution is unusual and unprecedented altogether. I know that it is considered by perhaps most of our people that when wrong has been done to us we should obtain redress immediately, and use force right off. By way of defense, I have no objection to that; but to use force to coerce satisfaction is a matter of dernier resort, and an act of war, no steps to which should ever be taken, I think, until a proper occasion is presented, and then it should be submitted for the exercise of the discretion of Congress to say whether sufficient satisfaction has been offered or not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will not prolong this debate, because I shall be compelled to ask that the subject be postponed in the event of further discussion. I made the report from the Committee on Foreign Relations in this case; and I am prepared to indorse the resolution thoroughly. I think the Senate understand it, and I will refrain from saying anything in vindication of it in the hope of getting a vote; otherwise, I shall have to move to postpone it with a view to take up the Oregon bill.

Mr. BAYARD. For the same reason, I shall forbear to express my opinions, though I am very clear in my convictions that the authority to use force by way of demonstration, which would be the result of the discretion here confided, instead of leading to war, would probably prevent war.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Dixon, Douglas, Evans, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Jones, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Simmons, Sillidell, and Toombs—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MASON. I hope the vote will now be taken on the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION OF OREGON.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Oregon into the Union as a State.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 239) for the admission of Oregon into the Union was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know that it is necessary to read the fourth section in regard to the land grants. It is the same as the grants to Kansas and Minnesota.

There being no objection, the reading of the fourth section was dispensed with.

Mr. MASON. I do not know how it is with other Senators, but I really have very little information about this distant Territory of Oregon as to the number of its population, whether they are sufficiently numerous to entitle them to come into the Union as one of the States. I do not even know whether they have sufficient population there to incur the necessary burdens of self-government in the formation of a State government. I am informed by the honorable Senator who reported the bill that there is no report accompanying it from his committee; and I do not know, therefore, how we are to get any information on the subject. I should, for one, place very little reliance on the statements made by Senators here for guiding their own judgment. I should be averse to guiding my own judgment by them, however satisfactory they might be to others. I doubt whether any one knows the population—whether it is twenty, or thirty, or forty, or more thousands. I am not prepared, without some official information that we may rely upon, taken under Federal authority, to vote for the admission of this State.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is no report accompanying the bill, for the reason that there was no official information before the committee, except that which is found embodied in the constitution itself, which is printed and before the Senate, and the authentication of that instrument. Last year this subject was before the committees of the two Houses, and the House of Representatives passed a bill for an enabling act to authorize the people of the Territory of Oregon to proceed to form a constitution and State government. The Territorial Legislature of Oregon, presuming that the Senate would concur in the action of the House of Representatives, proceeded to call a convention. The Committee on Territories of the Senate reported favorably on the bill of the House of Representatives, and I presume it was lost here solely because of the want of time on the last night of the session. I tried very hard to get it up, and I think that nothing but the want of time prevented its passage. The Oregon Legislature being in session in the mean time, had taken it for granted, as one House had passed an enabling act, that the other would concur, and proceeded to call a convention. The convention assembled and made the constitution. They submitted it to the people for ratification or rejection, and it was ratified by a very large majority. These are the principal facts.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Has he any knowledge of the number of votes given on the constitution? That might guide us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir. The number of votes given on the constitution was about eleven thousand—perhaps one or two hundred less than that number. I am informed by the Delegate that there being no serious contest, it was not a full vote. He thinks there are some seventy or eighty thousand inhabitants there. The vote would indicate about fifty or fifty-five thousand. I think there is a larger proportion of women and children in Oregon, in comparison with the number of voters, than in any of the other Territories, for the reason that it has been longer settled. Settlements commenced there in 1832. They remained with their provisional government up to 1848, and then were created into a territorial government, under the authority of law, and have been ten years under a territorial government. It is a quiet, stable community. A large portion of the people are old settlers, whose families have grown up around them, and there is a larger proportion of women and children to the voters than in any other Territory, and I think five to one would be a very reasonable estimate. This would give a population of fifty-five thousand, supposing eleven thousand to have been a full vote. I am assured, however, that it fell many thousand short of a full vote. I have no question that Oregon has a population of ten or twenty thousand more than Kansas, and I do not think, under the circumstances, that it would become us to reject Oregon, with a larger population, after having admitted Kansas, when we take into consideration the fact that there were no irregularities in Oregon; there has been no rebellion, no turmoil, no controversy there.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Illinois, whether I understand him to say that Kansas has been admitted as a State?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer the Senator very unequivocally. So far as this Congress is concerned, we have admitted Kansas, provided the people there choose to come in under the law we have passed. Whether they will or will not do so, is a question for them to decide, and not for me. If they desire to come in under that bill, with that proposition, then our action is final and conclusive; if not, she is not admitted.

But the point I was making was, that the population of Oregon is certainly larger than that of Kansas; and, after a bill has passed by which Kansas may come in, if she chooses, with that number of inhabitants, I did not expect to hear a question raised with regard to Oregon, a Territory where there has been no dispute about the regularity of the proceedings; no dispute about their loyal fidelity to the Government; no dispute but that they were a stable, industrious, and law-abiding community. Hence, I knew of no objection, except the strict, technical rule of population; and that having been waived in other cases, I supposed it would be waived in this. I am not disposed to take time, and I shall not detain the Senate.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall vote for the admission of Oregon. I wish to state, however, in doing so, that this is the last vote I shall ever give for the admission of a State into the Union without a census previously taken establishing that it has the amount of population requisite on the representative basis. I do so because I think, under the circumstances of the case, it would be rather an ungracious adherence to a rigid rule to require that, since for the last two or three sessions Congress has been acting on the admission of Kansas with an agreement on all hands that it should be admitted into the Union with a view of putting an end to the disturbances there, although it was conceded that the population was insufficient. In this case of Oregon, without having any precise and official information, it is evident that the population is a very respectable one in number—far exceeding any attributed to Kansas; and if it does not reach the representative basis, it is very near it. Under the circumstances, I will give a vote for the admission of this State; but I desire to put myself on the record as protesting against any extension of the principle. I shall hereafter oppose rigidly any such admissions.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, we have no exact information in regard to the population of Oregon; but the Delegate of that Territory, who has resided there ever since 1849, and has been, during that whole period, either the Governor or the representative of the Territory in the other House, informs me that he has no doubt the population equals eighty thousand persons. As stated by the Senator from Illinois, there are more families in that Territory than in any other Territory of the Union: many more than there are in my own State. Its settlement has been much more gradual than that of any of the new Territories: much more so than in California. Instead of there being only eleven thousand voters, as has been stated, I have been told by the Delegate from Oregon that they have cast as many as thirteen thousand votes; and, estimating the population to be in the proportion of six to each voter—which is a low estimate—the population of Oregon is now about eighty thousand.

Besides, this movement for a State constitution has been taken very deliberately by the people of Oregon Territory. The question was put to the people three times whether they would ask to be admitted as a State into the Union. Twice the people voted against it, on the principle which was alluded to by the Senator from Virginia, that they did not at that time desire to assume the responsibility and expenses of a State government. On the third occasion they voted in favor of forming a State constitution. They then elected delegates to a convention; and those delegates submitted their labors to the people, and a large majority of the people voted in favor of the constitution. It is impossible, without an enabling act, for a constitution to come before Congress in a better form and having received more deliberately the judgment of a people. I doubt whether there is a population in any of the Territories of the Union better qualified for a State government. I have been told that there are fifteen thousand landholders, farmers, in Oregon. We adopted a new system in the settlement of that Territory—giving donations of the public lands to actual settlers, and it has resulted in filling it with farmers, substantial citizens who have homes, and have improved them. I know of no Territory that is better qualified for admission into the Union as a State than Oregon, not even excepting Minnesota, for whose admission the Senate passed a bill a few weeks ago.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, there is a provision in the constitution of this new State which, as I understand, excludes people of African descent, though free, from toleration in that State. Against that, I wish to express my decided protest, and to say that it is with regret that I give a vote for the admission of a State which has that feature in its constitution. At the same time the State of Oregon is an old community, one of the oldest, the first colony of ours on the Pacific coast. It has, as has been so well said by the honorable Senator from California, been a long time in the process of settlement. The observation which I have made concerning it, has been, that the community established there are peaceful, orderly, competent to self-government. They are two thousand miles from the center. It is not a good thing to retain provinces or colonies in dependence on the Central Government, and in an inferior condition a day or an hour beyond the time when they are capable of self-government. The longer the process of pupillage, the greater is the effect which Federal patronage and Federal influence has upon the people of such a community. I believe that the people of Oregon are as well prepared to govern themselves as any people of any new State which can come into the Union.

I do not think the matter of numbers is of importance here. The numbers are estimated at eighty thousand. The present ratio of representation is ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty. Eighty thousand is a practical compliance even if that rule should be enforced; but I shall never consent to establish for my own government any arbitrary rule with regard to the number of population of a State. I can imagine States which I would not admit with a million of people, and I can imagine those which I would admit with fifty thousand. These are my explanations. I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the want of a sufficient number to entitle the proposed State to a Representative in the other House under the existing ratio of representation, although an objection in my mind, is, as the Senator from New York has said, not an insuperable one. I could get over that in some cases. At any rate I do not choose to commit myself to require any particular number at any one time, although I accede to the correctness of the principle. I have always considered it as a very great inequality in our system that a State should be admitted with not a sufficient number of people to entitle it to a single Representative under the existing ratio, and yet that it should bring two Senators on this floor. It seems to me to be disturbing the balance which was provided originally in the Constitution between the States.

However, sir, I am not disposed to speak of that point any further, because it would not influence my action in all cases. I cannot vote for the admission of Oregon under this constitution on another ground, and that is the ground which has been alluded to by the Senator from New York. I not only look upon it with regret, but to my mind the difficulty is insuperable. I do not believe in the doctrine of self-government to the extent which allows one portion of the citizens of the United States to interfere with the rights of another portion of the citizens of the United States. I do not hold, either in substance or in form, to any extent whatever, to the doctrines of the Dred Scott opinion. I believe, as I have before stated on this floor, that that opinion is a perversion of all law, of all fact, and of all history, and that there is nothing in it which should entitle it to my respect as a decision of the court under any circumstances—neither in the opinion itself, nor in the reasons given for it, nor in the mode in which it was procured; but I do not intend to enlarge on that point.

By the laws of Maine, and under the constitution of the State of Maine, free negroes are citizens—just as much citizens of the State of Maine as white men. It has been so solemnly decided by the highest tribunal of our State, since the decision in the Dred Scott case. The supreme court of Maine has decided that they are entitled to all the privileges, that they stand upon a perfect equality with white men, under the constitution and laws of that State. They are voters, and recognized as citizens under the terms of the constitution, which allows any citizen to vote. There is a clause in the constitution now presented from Oregon which prohibits free negroes from coming into the State and residing there; and it therefore prohibits a portion of the citizens of the State of Maine from going to Oregon. I cannot vote for the admission of any State with a constitution which prohibits any portion of my fellow-citizens of my own State from the enjoyment of the privileges which other citizens of the State have, and which the citizens of every other State have. Hence, sir, inasmuch as a portion of the people that I represent, the free citizens of the State of Maine, cannot, by the provisions of this constitution, be allowed to go into Oregon to reside, under any circumstances, it is an insuperable objection to my mind, and I cannot vote for the admission of Oregon as a State with such a constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President as I shall vote against the admission of Oregon, at the present time, I wish to state that I shall not do so for the reasons stated by the Senators from New York and Maine. There are many reasons why

I shall not vote for it. I do not agree in the views which have been stated. While I repudiate the doctrines of the Dred Scott decision, so far as that decision undertakes to establish slavery in the Territories, by virtue of the Constitution, and to limit the power of Congress over the Territories of the United States, I by no means assent to the doctrine that negroes are required by the Constitution of the United States to be placed on an equal footing in the States with white citizens.

I have no power to prevent Oregon, when she becomes a State, or the State of Maine, or any other State, dealing with her black population as shall seem to her best. That is a matter with which I have legally no right to interfere, while residing in another State, but I do not think that because persons of that class are allowed to vote in some of the States, therefore they are entitled to these privileges in other States, which do not think proper to give such privileges. And, sir, I am not prepared to say that Oregon may not prevent a negro population from coming and settling within her limits. It is a question, the argument of which I will not go into at this time, and I only make these remarks because it might be supposed that I design voting with the Senators from New York and Maine.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator misunderstands me. I vote for the bill notwithstanding that objection; the honorable Senator from Maine votes against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Without arguing this point at all, I make this statement, in order that my own position may be known. In the great controversy which we have had upon the slavery question I have never contended for giving the negro equal privileges with the white man. That is a doctrine I do not advocate. I have believed that negro slavery was an evil. I believed that under the Constitution of the United States the Congress of the United States had authority to govern its Territories. Possessing that authority, thinking slavery to be an evil, I believed it to be the duty of Congress, so long as it had authority over the Territories, to prevent the spread of slavery into them, they being free; and that the Constitution of the United States was neutral upon the subject of slavery, neither creating nor abolishing it of its own vigor. If we acquire territory, which, at the time of the acquisition, is slaveholding territory, it is not abolished by the acquisition; if it is non-slaveholding territory, then slavery is not established by the Constitution; and believing that slavery ought not to be established in Territories where it does not exist, I was opposed to the repeal of the Missouri compromise and the opening of Kansas to slavery.

Now, in regard to the clause in the constitution of Oregon, which her citizens have thought proper to adopt, excluding the settlement of free negroes in the State, I am not prepared to say that they may not adopt such a clause, but it is a question which I shall not now discuss. There are other reasons why I shall vote against the admission of Oregon at this time. We have here a naked bill for the admission of Oregon. We have no report from the committee; we have no evidence of her population; and the Congress of the United States has never passed any act authorizing the formation of a State government. Now, sir, I am opposed to the admission of new States without some evidence of their population and some regularity in their proceedings, in the formation of their constitutions. I think we ought to have some general system by which all the Territories should be guided in forming State constitutions, and asking admission into the Union. The amount of population has, with me, a good deal to do with the question. I might, under very extraordinary circumstances, vote for the admission of a State when the population was not sufficient to entitle it to one Representative in the other branch of Congress; but it would have to be a very extraordinary case, one endangering, as I thought, the peace of the country, before I would consent to do it. Here we have no evidence at all of the population of Oregon. Oregon has had no authority to form a State constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union. Under these circumstances, I am not disposed, at this time, to vote for her admission. I am willing to dispose of this question without examining the constitution at all, irrespective of what is in the constitution. I will not, myself, vote to admit her under the circumstances of the case; and, therefore, with a view of testing the sense of the Senate on this subject, I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust that motion will not prevail. It does not stop the debate. It will only lead to the consumption of more time, first; in the argument of the propriety of postponement, and secondly, in the discussion of the merits of the main question. I regret also that my colleague has deemed it his duty to introduce the slavery question in connection with this Oregon bill. As the people of Oregon had disposed of that question to suit themselves, I had hoped that we could abide by their decision without embarrassing our action here. On the submission of the constitution to the people of Oregon, the question of slavery was submitted separately, and also that of the admission of free negroes into the State; each was voted upon by the people, and both classes of colored persons were excluded from the State. As to the power of a State to exclude negro population from her limits, I had hoped there was no dispute at this day; but I do not feel at liberty to remain silent when the Senator from Maine raises the question of the right of a State to exclude colored population, for the reason that my State has, by constitutional provision, done the same thing, and so have other States of the Union. I hope that he does not intend to move to expel Illinois from the Union because she has a clause similar to the one under consideration, or to question her right to be in the Union with such a clause in her constitution.

I do not question the right of the people of Maine to confer just such privileges as they think proper in that State, under their local constitution, upon the colored population. If they choose to encourage a colored instead of a white population, it is their right to do so. If they choose to confer on them the right of self-government within the limits of that State, it is their right to do so. I do not question their right in Maine to allow a negro to vote, if they see proper, any more than I do the right of New York to say they shall vote provided they have $250 worth of property. These are matters that belong to the sovereignty of each State to decide for itself. Maine has decided the question in one way, Illinois has decided it the other; New York has made an anomalous provision, that allows a negro to vote provided he owns a certain amount of property, but will not allow him to vote on an equality with white men. I insist upon the right of Illinois, as a sovereign State of this Union, to keep negroes out of the State, whether free or slave, if Illinois chooses to do so. Whether she does so or not is a question for herself, and not for any other State to interfere with.

I thought that for several years we had recognized this doctrine completely. The renowned Kansas-Topeka constitution had a separate clause submitted to the people at the time of its adoption, making it the duty of the first Legislature to pass laws to prohibit the introduction of free negroes into Kansas, and that clause was adopted, whether you call it part of the constitution or not, as an instruction to the first Legislature that should assemble under the Topeka constitution. The dispute has been whether that clause was part of the constitution or not. It was a separate clause submitted to the people, which, if adopted, was to be an instruction to the Legislature. The Lecompton constitution contained a clause much more stringent than this. It was that no free negro should be permitted to live in Kansas. We allowed those people to say whether they wished that constitution or not. If they wish it, we have provided that they may come in under it; if they do not, they may make a new one.

The same thing has been done in Oregon. In Oregon the people were permitted to say for themselves, by a distinct vote, whether they wished a clause inserted in their constitution prohibiting the bringing there of any more negroes or mulattoes than now reside there. The Oregon constitution does not exclude or expel from the State the negro population now there, but it does make it the duty of the Legislature to provide by law efficient means of preventing the importation of any more colored population into that State. I think it is competent for them to do so. I do not think it is competent for us to inquire into the constitution, and deny their right to adopt that clause. I had hoped that, the people of Oregon having settled each of these matters for themselves, the negro question would not be raised in this debate, and then we should have nothing to consider but the simple question of population.

Now, one word as to population. I do not think there are ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty people in Oregon—the number required, according to the existing ratio, for a member of Congress. I think it ought to be a general rule for the admission of States to require that number. I have made several reports from the Committee on Territories in favor of that general rule. I reported a bill of that kind in 1856 as applicable to Kansas. I brought in this year such a proposition with a view to apply it to all Territories. I was willing to apply it to Kansas now, and to Oregon, if we had applied it to Kansas, and say that neither Kansas nor any other Territory should come in until it had that requisite population. But, sir, here are two inchoate States which have proceeded to make a constitution and take the preliminary steps for admission into the Union. You have agreed to receive one with less than the population required, and it has the smaller population of the two. Now, the question is, shall we, after having agreed to admit Kansas with—say forty thousand—refuse to admit Oregon with fifty-five thousand, as I think she has, or with eighty thousand, as her Delegate estimates? I think it is a discrimination that we ought not to make. When we come to other Territories, not having matured their applications, it will be a point proper then to be considered, because, to apply the rule to them will not be invidious; it will not be making a distinction disparaging one or conferring special favors upon another. I hope that, without further debate, unless there is some other question to arise, we shall be permitted to take a vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not disposed to make any further debate, but simply desire to say what I consider necessary in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Illinois. He asks me the question whether I would vote to expel Illinois from the Union?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I expressed the hope that you would not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator says he expressed the hope that I would not; but it was rather put interrogatively on the supposition that it was possible to expel her for the reason that she does not allow free people of color to come into that State to reside. I believe that is the policy of Illinois, though I do not know what the peculiar provision of her constitution is in that respect. The Senator, I suppose, will do me the justice to think that I understand the difference between the two cases; at all events I will not pay him so poor a compliment as to think that he does not understand the difference between the two cases; and therefore when he expresses that hope, I suppose it is rather by way of illustration than for the purpose of argument.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will confess that it was a playful remark. I did not suppose there was much danger of his making the motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, Mr. President, let me say, then, in addition to what I said before on this subject, that I attach no sort of consequence to all this talk about the power of Congress to reject a State. Some gentlemen are in the habit of saying that we cannot reject a State for such a reason, and we cannot reject a State for another reason. Sir, I hold to the broadest doctrine upon that point. Congress has a right to refuse the admission of a Territory applying to be admitted into the Union as a State for any reason or for no reason at all. The power given by the Constitution is unlimited. Congress may admit a State. That, in my judgment, includes all power over the subject; Congress may, if it chooses, refuse to admit a State, and Congress may do it for as many reasons as there are different members of Congress. This debate is an illustration. One member may object for one reason, another for another. Every member of Congress must act upon his own responsibility and for a reason that is satisfactory to him. I do not know that the reason I adduced for my action in this case would be satisfactory to any other member; I do not know that it would to my colleague; I do not know that there are any other States which stand in the peculiar attitude that my State does in this respect. But, sir, standing as she does with such a constitution, and with such a construction of her constitution as has been given by the highest judicial tribunal, to my mind the consequence is inevitable. As I said before, the constitution of the State of Maine makes negroes citizens. The question is not merely one of voting. I would not object to this constitution, if it said simply that no colored person should vote or should exercise the elective franchise. That is a different matter. I concede that a State must judge of that matter for itself. It has just as much power to fix that as a qualification, as any other. This question, however, goes much further than that. I have said that under the provisions of the constitution of the State of Maine, the supreme court of that State has decided that free negroes are citizens of that State, and have not only a right to vote as a necessary consequence of citizenship, but all other rights of citizens. The question was put to the court: had they a right to vote? That involved the point of citizenship; and the court has decided that free colored persons are citizens of the State of Maine.

Now, what does this constitution which is before us from Oregon, say? It says that no free colored persons shall be permitted to come into the State of Oregon. It says, therefore, that a certain set of people, who are citizens of the State of Maine, a certain portion of the citizens of the State of Maine, shall not be permitted to go into Oregon. What, then, is the result? As I said before, a certain number of my fellow-citizens, entitled to all the privileges in my State that I am under the laws of that State, not only of the elective franchise, but of being elected to office, are excluded from this proposed State. I say I cannot vote for the admission of a State which refuses to a portion of the citizens of the State of Maine the right to go into that State and reside, or the right to go there for any other purpose, when it extends that right to other citizens. The operation of such a provision on a portion of the citizens of my own State, makes my position peculiar.

After a State has been admitted into the Union, there is an end of our control, so far as the power of Congress goes. Oregon might be admitted without this provision in her constitution, and she might change it the next day within the forms of law, and prohibit free colored people from coming into that State; but it would give me no power, and Congress no power, to exclude her from the Union, or to make any objection to it. If a free citizen of the State of Maine, a person of color, then claimed any constitutional rights there, he must try them for himself; but, so far as the State was concerned, it would stand in the Union after making such an alteration of its constitution, precisely on the same ground that it did before, as a sovereign State of the Union. The individuals of other States, who felt aggrieved by its action, if they had rights there of which they were deprived, must seek for them, and sustain them at the proper tribunals, and in the proper way.

There is then very evidently, I say for an explanation and in reply to what the Senator from Illinois says was a playful remark of his, a very marked difference between exercising the power which I have as a Senator to vote against the admission of a State, and quarreling with that State for what she may do that I did not approve, or that I may think unconstitutional, after she is admitted into the Union. My power is ended as a Senator of the United States when the act of admission is consummated.

Now, sir, I do not feel disposed to argue this matter any further. I did not wish to bring in the slavery question, and I have not brought it into this debate at all. I have no desire to go over the old ground about that. I have expressed my opinions here often enough on that subject. My object simply was to state a reason in explanation of my vote on this question, which might perhaps, to some people, require explanation. I have given one sufficient ground (and I shall say nothing of others, for one good reason is enough) why I shall not feel justified in voting for this constitution which is presented to us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Maine admits that when Oregon is once in the Union, she may immediately adopt the clause that is now under debate, prohibiting the introduction of free negroes, but he thinks we ought not to admit her with that constitution. Now, permit me to say that if he acknowledges that she may do it the day after she is in the Union, it is a concession that she has a right to have that clause in her constitution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I mean to say that she has the power to put it there.

Mr. DOUGLAS. She has no power to put it there unless she has a constitutional right to put it there, for this reason: if it violates the Constitution of the United States, it is void. If it does not violate the Constitution of the United States, she has a right to put it there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a question for the courts, as I stated.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As it is a question for the courts, I would ask the Senator from Maine how are the people of Oregon to have an opportunity of testing that question in the courts unless you admit her? Unless you admit her, how can the question be raised? If the Senator would keep her out of the Union, because of that clause in her constitution, he would, by that negative vote, deprive her of the opportunity of going into the courts to ascertain whether or not she has a constitutional right to exercise this power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not understand my position at all, and he is going off at a tangent. The point I have presented is simply with reference to my own vote; I am not discussing the rights of Oregon at all, either in the Union nor out of it. I say that, if she should be admitted now in this way, or if, after being admitted with such a clause in her constitution, she should put it in, that involves matters affecting the rights of individuals which it will be for others to settle when they arise between her and them. I am not discussing that point, nor the rights of Oregon; but I am speaking merely as to what influences my vote. It is, that this provision is wrong in its operation upon my own State. That is not a question for the courts to settle, because, as a Senator, I have a right to vote as I please; and I give that as a reason for my vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I concede the right of the Senator to vote "no" upon the admission of Oregon. That I do not question at all. I supposed he was raising the point that it was wrong to receive Oregon into the Union with such a clause in her constitution. I repel that, because several States, my own among the number, have such clauses in their constitutions. I repel it, furthermore, for the reason that, if a State comes into the Union, she has a right to come in with just such a constitution as she pleases, provided it does not violate the Constitution of the United States. I deny your right to impose any limitations on the sovereignty of a new State that does not rest upon the sovereignty of all the States by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. I will not prolong the debate.

Mr. WADE. I am not going to argue this question at any length, but I observe in looking over the constitution presented to us from Oregon, that it enters upon a new doctrine, and goes further than any other State constitution which has yet been presented to us. The negro question has become familiar to us all; my position on it has been defined so often that I need not say anything about it now; but I perceive that this constitution puts Chinamen upon the same footing, and subjects them to the same disabilities with negroes. It appears to me that that is a novelty. I do not know how far a State may go, or ought to go, in discriminating between the rights of one foreign people and another. I do not rise now to debate the subject, but barely to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this constitution, for the first time, so far as I know, undertakes to discriminate between the rights of foreigners coming into the State, for it declares that "no negro, Chinaman, or mulatto, shall have the right of suffrage." That disability it imposes alike upon Chinamen and negroes. In another clause it declares, "that no Chinaman, not a resident of this State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall ever hold any real estate or mining claim, or work any mining claim therein." And I believe upon every occasion where they are mentioned, it puts Chinamen, negroes, and mulattoes on precisely the same footing. The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress may establish a uniform system of naturalization. Suppose a foreigner from China should be naturalized under the laws of the United States, would not his rights be in conflict with this provision of the constitution of Oregon? I am not now prepared to decide that point. At all events, this is a novelty, and it would sound rather harshly in our ears if the provision were that no Englishman or mulatto should be entitled to certain rights, or that a Frenchman and mulatto should be put under certain disabilities; but so far as I know, the principle would be precisely the same. If we begin to discriminate between foreign people, I do not know where we shall stop, nor by what principle we shall be governed.

But, sir, as I said before, I did not rise to argue this question. These provisions attracted my notice, and I merely desired to suggest them, thinking they might be of sufficient importance to challenge the investigation of the Senate. Here is an attempt to discriminate between one foreign people and another immigrating into the United States. It strikes me that it would be invidious and unjust. I do not like the looks of it, to say the least.

Mr. WILSON. The people of Oregon, Mr. President, have framed and adopted a constitution excluding slavery; and I am sure no State rejoices more over that act of the people of Oregon than the people of the State I represent. They will expect me to give my vote to welcome the free State of Oregon into this sisterhood of free Commonwealths. I know I may be censured—censured by personal and political friends—but I cannot give my vote for the admission of Oregon into the Union under this constitution. The people of Oregon have adopted a constitution excluding slavery; but they have put a provision in this constitution which I believe to be unconstitutional, inhuman, and unchristian. They not only exclude negroes and mulattoes from residing in the State, but they have made a provision that they cannot hold any real estate there; they cannot make any contracts, nor "maintain any suit." Now, Mr. President, I live in a Commonwealth that recognizes the absolute and perfect equality of all men of all races. A mulatto or negro in the State I represent is not only a citizen of the State; he not only has the right to vote, but, if the people choose to do it, they may elect him to any office in their gift.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I know that the laws of Massachusetts recognize the entire equality of the negro with the white man. I would ask, however, whether the people of that State recognize the social equality of the negro, and treat him socially as an equal?

Mr. WILSON. That is a very difficult question to give a precise and exact answer. I know that in Massachusetts, as in other free States, and I think in the free States quite as much as in the slave States, there is a strong prejudice against colored people, and it exists to more or less extent in Massachusetts. However, the public sentiment of that State is up to this point: it has given them all the legal rights it gives to the rest of the people, and every man among them has open to him all the avenues and pursuits of life. He can make himself what he chooses to be. There is a prejudice, and an unjust prejudice, in regard to men of intelligence and of personal character, men in every proper sense of the word highly respectable. I do not think in social life they are fully recognized; that colored men, with the same intellectual qualities, the same moral qualities, are not in Massachusetts regarded as they would be if they were white men. I hope the Senator understands my answer.

I find, that in a book written a quarter of a century ago by Sir William Gore Ouseley, speaking of this prejudice in this country, he said:

"If an individual, concentrating the wisdom and virtues of every age in his own person, and inheriting the qualities of a Socrates, an Alfred, a Gustavus Basil, and a Washington combined, were born with a negro skin in the United States, I do not think that he would ever be allowed a perfectly social equality with a white scoundrel."

That same feeling lingers, to more or less extent, in all the States of the Union, my own State included. We have, in Massachusetts, about eight thousand colored persons, and I may say that, generally, they are persons of intelligence, of morality, of personal character. Hundreds of those persons go out in our ships to every portion of the globe. Many of them go on board our whale ships to the Pacific ocean. Everywhere where the commerce of my State goes, these men sail on board our ships.

Mr. MASON. As cooks and stewards.

Mr. WILSON. Some of them as cooks, some of them as stewards, and some of them as sailors, and braver or better sailors do not exist in the country than the colored sailors who may be found in New Bedford and other sea-ports of Massachusetts. They are as good sailors as their fathers were good soldiers in the days of the Revolution. The Senator from Virginia will remember that at the celebration at Bunker Hill in June last, which he attended, Governor Everett spoke on that day of the services of a poor, humble, colored man, who shot down Major Pitcairn, on the 17th of June, 1775, and that touching allusion by the graceful orator was gratefully received by the vast throng, and I doubt not it was as gratefully recognized by the Senator as by any other person. Bancroft, in the seventh volume of the history of the United States, just published, says:

"Nor should history forget to record that, as in the army at Cambridge, so also in this gallant band, the free negroes of the colony had their representatives. For the right of free negroes to bear arms in the public defense was at that day as little disputed in New England as their other rights. They took their place, not in a separate corps, but in the ranks with the white man, and their names may be read on the pension rolls of the country, side by side with those of other soldiers of the Revolution."

There are hundreds of men in Massachusetts, the descendants of men who fought in the ranks of our fathers in the Revolution; who fought on board our ships of war in the last war with Great Britain—the descendants of men who gave their lives and their blood to the independence and liberties of this country; and they, in Massachusetts, have enjoyed the benefits for which their ancestors fought. If the descendants of those brave men should go on board a whale ship, go to the Pacific ocean, land in Oregon, in stress of weather, it may be, go on shore, be smitten down, nearly murdered, by white villains, without cause, they cannot maintain a suit in the courts of that State. They may be abused, they may be murdered, any outrage may be inflicted, any indignity may be put upon them, but they cannot maintain a suit in the courts of that State to protect them in their personal rights. Is this not inhuman, unchristian, devilish? I cannot vote to sanction a proposition which outlaws men for no crime.

Now, sir, is there a slave State that has such a provision in her constitution or laws? There may be; I do not know. I say, Mr. President, that it is inhuman, it is unchristian, it is unworthy a free State, and while free States, or States calling themselves free, make such provisions, maintain such inhuman enactments, I advise them all to close their mouths against the system of slavery in the United States. When I give my voice or my vote to maintain any such outrages or any such wrongs, I will close my lips forever against slavery in any portion of the country. If we are opposed to slavery as a violation of human rights: (and if we are opposed to it at all we are opposed to it on that broad ground); if we are opposed to it because it violates the rights of man, we had better put our own States and our own public sentiments right, before we arrange others.

I cannot vote for the admission of Oregon into the Union with this constitution, though I do not wish to vote against the admission of a free State. I would welcome free States, even if they have not constitutions precisely as I would like them, and trust to the influences of time; but I cannot give my vote for a State that has adopted a provision not only excluding these men, but denying to them the right, if they land there but for an hour, the right to sue in the courts of the State, for the protection of their persons, the protection of their lives against lawless violence. I may refrain from voting, for I do not wish to vote against the admission of a free State into this Union, but I cannot vote for a provision of this character. I should feel that if I did it, I gave my own personal sanction to it. In refusing to vote for the admission of Oregon, I may meet the censure of political friends in my own State, and in other portions of the country. But, sir, with me this is a matter of conscience, and I cannot do it.

Mr. IVERSON. Mr. President, I cannot vote for the admission of Oregon into the Union, under the circumstances in which she presents herself; and I desire to present, very briefly, the reasons which operate on my mind in coming to this conclusion. I do not object to the admission of Oregon upon the grounds which have been presented on the other side of the Chamber, although there are things in the constitution of Oregon to which my judgment does not yield its assent. The provision in relation to alien suffrage I think is an error on the part of the people of Oregon. But, although I object to some things in the constitution of Oregon, that is not the ground on which I object to the admission of the State; for I recognize, in the broadest sense, the right of the people of a Territory, when they come to form their constitution for the purposes of admission into the Union, to regulate their domestic institutions as they choose, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. If they do not violate any provision of the Constitution of the United States, I think they have the right to regulate their domestic institutions as they choose; and, although I might think their action unwise, it is not sufficient foundation for objection to their admission.

But I object, too, on the ground that she really has not population sufficient to entitle her to admission. We do not know what the population is, but it seems to be conceded on all hands that she has not got the population necessary to entitle any of the other States to a representation in the other branch of Congress: she has not got ninety-four thousand inhabitants. That is admitted on all hands. It is said by some that she probably has eighty thousand. There is no evidence of it, no foundation whatever for the statement. Others say she has not more than forty thousand, and I think it probable that that is nearer the truth.

Now, I think it a dangerous precedent to admit a State that has not the requisite population to entitle her to a Representative in Congress. I know that this has been done before. I know that exceptions to the general rule have occurred, as in the case of Florida, when she was admitted pari passu with a free State, and admitted because she was a slave State, or perhaps for the consideration that she was an exceedingly expensive Territory to the United States, and there was no prospect of a day coming—at least it was exceedingly remote—when she would have the requisite population, and therefore she was admitted into the Union to avoid an extraordinary expense to this Government. There may be extraordinary considerations arising in a particular case, which would induce me to waive this general rule, and admit a State, as in the case of Kansas. She has been admitted—at least I voted for her admission from extraordinary considerations, circumstances attendant alone upon her, applicable exclusively to her case, and which we all understand, and which had their effect on the mind of every gentleman who voted on that question. But that was an exceptional case, and so was the case of Florida. The general rule is undoubtedly a good one, that no State ought to be admitted into the Union without the necessary number of inhabitants, and that number ought to be ascertained in some authentic shape. We ought not to act on mere conjecture or the mere suppositions which gentlemen present.

This is the ground on which I shall object to the admission of Oregon into the Union at the present time. Why, sir, if we are to admit Oregon without a full knowledge and authentic information in relation to the number of her inhabitants, and without her having the number to justify her admission, we must, of course, admit other States that come under similar circumstances and present themselves for admission. Why shall we not admit Nebraska, if she should take it into her head between now and the next session of Congress to form a constitution and ask for admission? Upon what ground could we object to the admission of Nebraska, with a population perhaps of not more than twenty or thirty thousand people, and perhaps not that many; and, hereafter, when Utah or New Mexico or Dacotah, or any other Territory, shall ask for admission, desiring to come into the Union without the requisite population, upon what principle should we, after the admission of Oregon now, object to her admission? None upon earth.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana says he will never give his vote again for the admission of any State into the Union that has not the requisite population; but he is willing to waive it, on the present occasion, for considerations which affect his mind. I cannot see why he or any man can vote for the admission of Oregon, and hereafter vote against the admission of any other Territory, upon the ground of population. The principle is the same in all cases. There are certainly no peculiar considerations applicable to the case of Oregon. She does not come in pari passu with a slave State; and, therefore, there can be no argument on that score for waiving the consideration of numbers. She does not come and ask for admission, surrounded by extraordinary circumstances of agitation and danger and alarm to the country and to the Union, such as Kansas presented. There are no peculiar circumstances, as I understand, attendant upon the case of Oregon, which demand that Congress should waive the objections heretofore presented, and admit her into the Union. I do not see any reason why she should be admitted now.

I am rather inclined to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] to postpone the consideration of this bill until the first Monday in December next, and in the mean time Oregon may, if she thinks proper to do so, take measures to ascertain what her population is. She can order a census, and between now and then it can be ascertained whether she has the representative population or not, and then we can admit her. In the mean time, the State may, if she has the requisite number of people, go on and elect her Senators and Representative to Congress in advance of her admission, as Minnesota did, and as has been done heretofore by other States, and we could finally admit the State at the next session, having the requisite population, and we could permit her Senators and Representative to take their seats.

These are the considerations which induce me to vote for the proposition to postpone. I would rather vote to postpone than vote against the admission. I believe that is the safest and most prudent course. Let the people of Oregon in the mean time take such steps as they may choose to ascertain whether they have the requisite population or not. If she has, and presents herself at the next session, then this bill can be passed. If she has not, then we can act as Congress may judge proper.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I think the country is gaining some experience on the subject of the condition of the African population in our midst—a wise experience; and I think the evidences presented to-day on the other side of the Chamber show that that experience is beginning to have its fruits. I understand the honorable Senator from Maine to make the single objection to the admission of this State, that the State has, by constitutional law, prohibited any future migration of the negro race within its boundaries. That is the only objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the objection I stated. Mr. MASON. It is the objection the Senator stated; and I take it for granted it is a conclusive objection with him that that community, in forming its fundamental law, deemed it wise to prohibit the African race from coming amongst them.

Mr. President, in the slaveholding States it was found necessary many years ago, to preserve the character of our slave population, that the same sort of laws should be enacted. I do not remember how many years ago, in Virginia, but a number of years ago, a law was passed making it penal upon any negro emancipated after the year 1806, or the descendants of such negro, to remain in the State after his emancipation, and the same law prohibits free negroes from coming into the State. We had our policy in that—a very necessary policy, but a police one altogether—to preserve the condition of the slave population. We had another one, if you please, which was of a very subordinate character. I do not know that, if only the subordinate objection had existed, any such legislation would have taken place. This was that the negro free is the most worthless population that can be conceived of, and not worthless alone, but contaminating, vicious, depraved, unprincipled, without any recognition of any moral law, or moral obligation. I do not speak of individuals; I speak of the great mass of the emancipated negroes. But the true reason for the prohibition of the African race free from slave communities was, because it contaminated and did mischief to the slave population, not by rendering them insubordinate at all, but by imbuing them, wherever they came in contact, with the vice and depravity that belong to the African who is not a slave.

However, our friends in the free States have gained some experience. It might be taken for granted by moralists, I should have taken it for granted, reasoning a priori, that where they were so intent on having the African race free, they would welcome them as brothers within their borders; they would admit them not only to political equality, but to that social equality of which something was said just now. At any rate, if they insist upon having the African race on our continent free, moralists would say that then a correlative duty, and an absolute duty, is to admit them to participation in political rights, and to admit them as citizens within the States which belong to your community. But, I say our friends in the free States have had some experience upon this subject; and their experience has shown that the African race with them exists as the African race does everywhere where it is not in bondage—a vicious, corrupt, unprincipled class of men, who are never in quiet. The result has been, as stated by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that in his State, which is a State prohibiting African slavery, and I think also in the State of Indiana by recent enactment, and I doubt not in many other States, they have found it absolutely necessary, as a police regulation, to exclude that population from their limits. Oregon has done no more. Oregon, being about to come in as a State, profiting by the experience of those who have gone before her, feels, and knows the necessity, if this race is amongst them at all, to have it in bondage.

Well, sir, there is a little more experience resulting from this movement which has taken place in the non-slaveholding States in reference to the African race. Where are they to go? They perish with cold in Canada, where they have been driven from the necessity of their condition, being excluded from many of the free States, expelled from them; and they could not go into the slaveholding States, and there was no alternative but to get beyond the boundary into Canada. What is their condition there? I remember to have seen, during the last winter, a speech made, manifestly, by a very sensible mind, in the Provincial Parliament, depicting the condition of the African race free in Canada as a plague spot in their midst, and one that they must get rid of.

We have had some further experience on this subject; and I am strongly disposed to believe this despised African race are at last beginning to be taught who are their friends and who are not. They are beginning to be taught by dire experience in this exclusion and expulsion of them from the free States, and in the cold welcome that they receive amidst the snow and the ice of Canada, who are their true friends and who are not; and the result has been that, in the State of Virginia, and I see recently in the State of Texas, so many have been the applications by free negroes to escape from their freedom—which you have made intolerable to them—and to be returned to bondage, that those States have been constrained by general legislation to provide a mode by which free negroes may go into voluntary servitude.

Now, sir, there is a good deal of experience in all that; and the time may come—I doubt not the time is at hand—when the States, who are non-slaveholding States only because slavery is not valuable to them, and their climate will not admit of it, will find, whatever may be their theoretic or their abstract opinions, that their obligations to themselves and to their communities will compel them to exclude this population from amongst them; that the free black population will eventually come back to the southern States and ask as a boon to be admitted into slavery. Through the action of the philanthropic spirit that now pervades the free States, they will obtain a true knowledge of their real social condition; they will realize what has been proved so far, at least, on this continent as the true character of that race, that in slavery, upon this continent, their condition is every day one of improvement; that, in freedom upon this continent, their condition is every day one of depression and sinking; that in bondage they are not only elevated in social life, but they are elevated in civilization and in religion. Where they are free they are despised, loathed, not tolerated in a society that professes to tolerate them; and their residences are found always in destitution and poverty. They will thus attain a true knowledge of their social condition, and they will be indebted to their friends in the non-slaveholding States for bringing them to that.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, I may well say, that from the exhibition made on the other side of the Chamber to-day we are beginning to see the fruits of this experience—fruits that the negro race will realize for themselves in good time; and we shall be indebted at last to the sagacity or the instinct more than to the intelligence of that race for thus realizing what is their true social condition and embracing it. But in the mean time I regret very much that it is not in my power to vote for the admission of Oregon—not for the reasons assigned by the honorable Senator from Maine, for I think Oregon has done wisely; she has profited by the experience of other States, and has seen the absolute necessity of excluding this population from her limits if she would preserve her community intact. But I must object to the admission of Oregon because we have no evidence in the world that she has sufficient population to entitle her to admission, and we have every evidence that she has not the numbers to entitle her to admission.

I see, in looking into documents accompanying this constitution, that the largest vote that was given there was ten thousand three hundred and ninety. There were two votes taken at the time of the adoption of the constitution, one for and against the constitution, and the other for and against slavery. The largest vote was that given on the constitution, and the aggregate was ten thousand three hundred and ninety. Honorable gentlemen have seemed to feel themselves at liberty to go into conjecture and estimate on this point. I recollect, that as to the admission of Minnesota, the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] and the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK,] and others, went into a sort of estimate pro rata, that it was to be considered that there were probably five in the family of every voter, and they conjectured that where there were ten thousand voters there were fifty thousand people—a sort of estimate that did not satisfy me; but taking it on that ground, the highest vote the people of Oregon have given is ten thousand three hundred and ninety, and that would show by that sort of unsatisfactory estimate, that they had very little more than one half the number necessary to entitle them properly, under the Constitution, to admission.

Well, where are we to stand, if States are to be admitted into this Union without reference to their population? Each State must of necessity have one Representative, at least, in the other House, and two here. You then have a vote of three in the joint legislation of the country against the half of one vote in one of the States which is properly entitled by its population to representation in the two Houses. It is unfair, unequal, and unjust; it is destroying the equilibrium of our institutions. It is no longer a popular representation. There is no safety in it to those who rest upon the constitutional law for their safety, and there can be none. I am aware that it has been done; but I think by violence. In the recent case of Kansas, her population, I believe, was conjectured only by the vote. I felt myself under a degree of constraint from very high political considerations—not on the question of slavery at all, but to preserve the peace of the country, and if we could, the integrity of the Union—to waive a great deal. It was but a conditional admission at last, that was extended to Kansas; and even in that conditional act of admission there is the precedent that if she does not avail herself of the opportunity now given to her to come in with her population, whatever it may be, she shall not come in thereafter until her population is ascertained to be such as to entitle her to admission. And yet on the heel of that very precedent, it is proposed to admit Oregon with a population that even, by their own conjecture, does not exceed fifty thousand. I can see no propriety in it. Although from the kind feeling which I hope actuates us all towards the people of that distant Territory, I should be very happy to find her in a condition to be welcomed into the Union, I regret that as it is, until otherwise informed, the proposition cannot have my vote. I should think, however, the better way would be to postpone it until December, rather than reject the State; and I would be willing, if gentlemen think it would result in good, to pass a law to take a census and see what her population is; but I protest against admitting a State on a territorial census. It must be taken, I think, under the sanction of Federal law. I shall concur very cheerfully in postponing the bill, rather than rejecting the application.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, being one of the committee that reported this bill, I may be permitted to say in a word why I intend to vote for it, and that word will not be with reference to the question of slavery. I hope that question will not be brought up, unnecessarily, for it has already consumed too much of the time of this session when it had a legitimate bearing upon the questions pending before the Senate.

It is supposed, and the arguments are predicated upon that supposition, that the population of Oregon is only about fifty thousand. The information that I have is of a different character. There has never yet been an iron rule fixing an exact number to entitle a Territory to exercise its right in the creation of a State government and apply for admission into the Union. It is all a mere matter of policy and discretion; but an ordinary rule of propriety would say that as a State must have one Representative in the other branch of Congress, it ought to have population sufficient for that before its admission; but that addresses itself to us only as a rule of propriety. There may be, as was remarked by the Senator from Georgia, various reasons why that rule of propriety may be departed from, and in this case I think I can show reasons why it ought to be departed from.

What, then, is the population of Oregon? It is known that in that Territory there are sixteen thousand persons subject to a poll-tax returned by the assessors. The vote referred to by the Senator from Virginia was only a little over ten thousand, but that vote was taken at a season of the year when a very large proportion of the vote could not be polled. The voters were absent at the mines, they were in a more profitable employment, and did not attend and record their names. Besides, on that occasion, there was no contest; it was a comparatively one-sided election. Here is a State whose poll-list, made up by sworn officers, shows sixteen thousand men; and more men can vote than would be liable to be entered on the poll-list for a poll-tax. When they get above forty-five, I believe they are not taxed a poll-tax; yet they are permitted to vote as long as they live. More, therefore, can vote in all the States of the Union, so far as I have examined the question, than would be entered upon the poll-list. Hence I assume, as a data, which cannot be successfully controverted, that there are at least sixteen thousand voters. Now the ordinary average of population to the polls is not less than five; multiply them by that, and you have eighty thousand inhabitants. It never has been the rule that a legal regular census must first be taken before we admit a State. There never has been any such practice on the part of Congress. There is no constitutional rule, there is no reason why we should be governed alone by a legal census.

Mr. MASON. I did not hear distinctly. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask, where did he get the vote of sixteen thousand?

Mr. GREEN. I did not get the vote. I get the poll-tax, and I say that the vote of the Territory is larger than the number of persons liable to poll-tax, because it includes a class of persons not liable to be taxed on the head. Now, sir, as there is no constitutional rule, as there is no legal rule, as there is nothing but a question of propriety, why is it that there shall be such formidable opposition to the admission of Oregon into the Union?

The Senator from Virginia says, every State that is admitted lessens the power and influence of the old States. True, it does. The comparative power in the Senate was lessened when you admitted Texas, but it was no sufficient argument to keep Texas out of the Union; and so with every other State. It lessens the comparative influence of each old State, but I am proud to believe that this is a Confederation capable of indefinite expansion; and being a confederation, being an association of independent sovereignties, that question of limitation of power, that question of diminution of power does not apply as it would in a more aggregated community. It is still an association of equals.

Is Oregon to come in as a sister in this Republic? She fancies herself capable of sustaining a State government. We see, by clear, moral evidence, satisfactory to any one who will investigate the subject, that she has at this time about eighty thousand inhabitants. We see a train of circumstances directing population to that Territory. We have a reasonable ground of expectation that even before next December there will be more than one hundred thousand people there. Why, then, should Oregon be kept out of the Union? By the admission of her as a State, we save the Federal Government from all the expenses of maintaining her territorial organization. If she is willing to take upon herself the organic form of a State, and bear the burdens of a State, why not allow her to do so? Consider her great distance from you, and the uncertainty of communication. Is it to be a mere dependency of the Federal Government? Must it always look to the Federal head, and that Federal head more than twenty-five hundred miles distant? That ought to be one reason why we should relax a rule, even if we had a rule, in favor of Oregon, when she esteems herself able to take care of herself, of ability enough to sustain a separate State organization. Her relations to the rest of the world will all be conducted by the Federal Government. All external relations, in peace and in war, in the making of treaties, in the defense of her coast, will remain as they are; but in the internal administration of her own municipal affairs, why not take off the coercive restraint of a distant Federal power, and permit her to set up for herself, when we see the circumstances under which she presents herself?

I believe it to be good policy for the Federal Government, and I believe it will be to the advantage and development, and growth and increase of Oregon as a State. While they feel dependent they do not exert themselves. It is a constant tax on the Federal Government to pay for governors, legislative councils, legislative assemblies, courts of justice, grand juries, and prosecuting attorneys. Why not save ourselves from all that expense, when we know it does not endanger the existence of the State to acknowledge her independence? She is not to be brought in collision with a foreign Government. She is only to be set up as an independent sovereignty within the limits prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, having all original power, except that which is given to the Federal Government by the Federal Constitution. In the administration of her municipal affairs she will be free and independent. The coercive power of the Federal Government will be removed; her dependence on the Federal Government will be taken away. The expense which she has been to this Government will be also saved.

Why then shall we not admit her? I see no reason for it; and I intend not to go into the subject of free negroes or slaves. The people of Oregon have chosen to act for themselves. I recognize their right to act for themselves. If I were a citizen there, I might vote in a certain way; but I have no right to tell you, Mr. President, how I would vote, because it is not a legitimate matter to influence the Senate, and I have no right to utter a single thought in the Senate to influence the country which I have no right to present to influence the Senate. This is no place for the promulgation of mere abstract opinions. It is a place for the discussion and elucidation of matters on which we have a right to vote, and no others.

Mr. BROWN. I rather think, sir, that I shall vote against the admission of this State, because, if our Republican friends desire to exclude a free State from the Union, it does not seem to me that I, representing a different interest politically, should interest myself particularly to get in such a State. If they asked for the admission or Oregon as a free State, I probably should waive minor points, and go for the bill. If they put it distinctly on the ground that Kansas had been admitted as a slave State, and that now justice and propriety require Oregon, under similar circumstances, to come in as a free State, I could waive all minor considerations, and take her in; but if they resist it, I rather think I shall go with them. It is no business of mine to be multiplying free States; they are against my interest, and against the section of country from which I come.

But, sir, there is a point in this debate that I do not exactly understand. Senators on the other side seem to be quite satisfied that Oregon has excluded slavery, but they go a step further, and object that she has excluded free negroes. It looks to me as if gentlemen from the free States are getting exceedingly anxious to multiply their free negro population. I thought there was some opposition in most of the free States to an increase of this kind of population. If there is a change of policy in that respect, I meet it half way. We have a large number of free negroes in my State of which we should be very glad to get clear, and if it be really true that gentlemen from northern States want them quartered off on the free States of the Union, upon the young ones, and of course upon the old ones, then I shall urge a proposition to send all ours to Massachusetts and New York. [Laughter.] We have some four thousand or five thousand, perhaps as many as eight thousand in Mississippi. We will divide them between New York and Massachusetts, and my good-natured friend before me [Mr. WILSON] can take charge of his part, and the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] can take charge of his part. Heretofore I have always understood that gentlemen from the northern States were opposed to receiving this class of population. I have always known that they were anxious to make negroes free, and when they were free, I have understood they were very anxious to get clear of them. [Laughter.] I have known that a northern man would rise late at night and burn his last candle—I do not mean the whole northern people, but a large portion of them—to make a light by which he could see his way clear to pilfer somebody's negro; but if you send him one perfectly free, born so, he would turn him loose, and have nothing to do with him. An old gentleman in my State, a member of our Legislature, suggested the idea when they were talking of getting clear of our negro population. He said: "I will tell you exactly how it can be done; take them two and two, handcuff them, take them up to the Kentucky shore above Louisville, advertise them for sale, and the Abolitionists from Ohio will come and steal them; but if you send them over without shackles they will not have them on any account." [Laughter.]

What a mockery is all this sympathy with the negro, with his hard estate, with having him a freeman equal to the white man, and yet northern gentlemen will no more allow him to go into their States than they would allow a pestilence to come in if they could prevent it! They are willing to force them off on somebody else—to force Oregon to take them. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts, now, are you willing to have the free negroes of the South quartered off on Massachusetts? I may ask that question of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] who is about to speak. I see it working in him, and he will get it out directly. [Laughter.] I ask him whether he would be willing to see all the free negroes of Mississippi and Louisiana quartered off on New Hampshire? I dare say he will answer, with his usual frankness, that he would not. Where then are they to stay? You insist on sending them to Oregon, forcing them on another people against their will, but you are not willing to take them yourselves. We are willing to keep our part of them until they choose to go somewhere else voluntarily, and when they go, we insist that they shall have the right to go.

I say again, I rather think I shall vote against the bill; but if gentlemen on the other side will say that they are willing to take Oregon as a free State, and make no opposition to it, I do not know but that I may get over my little scruples, and vote for it; but I am not going to force on myself another free State. I am not going to beg you to take another free State. If you ask it, and ask it gently and cleverly, I think we shall let you have it; but we will not beg you to take it.

Mr. HALE. I suppose we can hardly get a vote to-night; and as the usual hour for adjournment has arrived, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I do not intend to occupy a great deal of time; but some things have been said, in the course of this debate, that seem to me to require an answer. I wish to throw out, in the first place, for the consideration of gentlemen, a suggestion in relation to an article in our treaty with China. We treat China as a civilized nation, and one with whom we hold diplomatic intercourse; and, by the first article of the treaty with that Empire, it is provided that—

"There shall be a perfect, permanent, universal peace, and sincere and cordial amity, between the United States of America, on the one part, and the Tsa-tung empire on the other, and between their people respectively, without exception of persons or places."

It may be a matter of consideration to know how the treaty obligations created by that treaty consist with the eighth section of the fifteenth article of the constitution presented to us from Oregon; which is, that—

"No Chinaman not a resident of this State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall ever hold any real estate or mining claim, or work any mining claim therein."

Is that provision against the whole people of China consistent with the first article of our treaty, which declares that there shall be a permanent universal peace and sincere and cordial amity between the two nations, and between all the people thereof, without exception of persons or places; meaning that it shall be so between all persons and all places of the two countries? But I shall not dwell upon that. This constitution contains another article which provides that "no free negro or mulatto, not residing in this State at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall ever come, reside, or be within this State, or hold any real estate, or make any contract or maintain any suit therein." I disagree entirely with a good many of the suggestions thrown out by the honorable Senator from Virginia, and I suppose he expected that I would. In regard to the State which I have the honor to represent here, I desire to correct one historical error that I have heard made on this floor I do not know but a thousand times. I allude to the assertion that, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, negro slavery existed legally in every State in this Union except one, and that one Massachusetts. Sir, the State which I have the honor to represent, so far as I believe and am informed, never by law recognized the state of slavery within its limits. It is very certain that as early as January, 1775, eighteen months before the Declaration of Independence, and six months before the battle of Bunker Hill, the State of New Hampshire adopted a constitution under the operation of which slavery could not exist.

I recollect, on one occasion, that an honorable Senator from Virginia, on the occasion of a visit made by Mr. Fillmore to that State, claimed for Virginia the credit of having been the first of the old thirteen States to form a written constitution. I have also heard the same honor claimed for the State represented by the honorable Senator from South Carolina. But, sir, as a matter of fact, the first State on this continent that ever formed a written constitution was the State of New Hampshire. She formed it as early as January, 1775, and it has been very little altered from that time to this. We lived under it all through the revolutionary war. We made a slight amendment in 1791, and that is all the amendment we made to it, with the solitary exception of the removal of a property qualification on office-holders. Since the adoption of our constitution on the 20th of January, 1775, there has been no difference recognized in New Hampshire in regard to the rights of citizens between Africans and white persons. A year and a half before the Declaration of Independence, New Hampshire, by her constitution, had abolished negro slavery; whereas the constitution of Massachusetts, which abolished it, was not adopted until 1780.

Mr. EVANS. The constitution of South Carolina was adopted in January, 1776.

Mr. HALE. The constitution of South Carolina was a year afterwards; and I want to put that point right, because, although it is not a matter of much consequence, I have heard it stated certainly a thousand times on this floor that all the States, with the exception of Massachusetts, tolerated negro slavery at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution; whereas it was formally abolished, by constitution, in New Hampshire five years before it was abolished in Massachusetts, by the adoption of the constitution of 1780, and from that time to the present there has never been any difference in the rights of people in New Hampshire on account of race.

Mr. MASON. I wish to inquire of the Senator in regard to a historical fact. I understood him to say that the present constitution of the State of New Hampshire, which was adopted by that State in 1775, has been very little modified.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. I am not, of course, conversant with the early history of the State which that Senator represents; but did that constitution declare the colony of New Hampshire independent of the mother country?

Mr. HALE. Just exactly in the same way that the constitutions of Virginia and South Carolina did. It contained a preamble that, during the existence of the present unhappy difficulties between the United Colonies and the Crown, this constitution was established. The same provision was contained in the constitution of South Carolina, and I think the same in Virginia.

Mr. MASON. I observe, in looking in a book which happens to be at hand, that it was not until June, 1776, that New Hampshire declared herself independent of Massachusetts, and I was not aware that previous to that time she had declared herself independent of Great Britain.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator will find himself mistaken in regard to the fact of her declaring herself independent of Massachusetts. The Senator is altogether mistaken. I do not know what book he has got, but it is apocryphal, anyhow.

Mr. MASON. It is a book published in New York.

Mr. HALE. It is certainly a mistake, and I am right; there is no doubt about that, sir, whatever the book says. [Laughter.] In January, 1775, New Hampshire formed a constitution and established a government independent of the Crown of Great Britain. Our people lived under it, without any essential modification, until 1790 or 1791, and after the war was over there was a slight amendment made, and one slight amendment since. By that constitution, slavery was rendered impossible in New Hampshire, and always was from the adoption of that constitution. The only difference that has ever been recognized by our laws is, that colored men have not been required to perform military service.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi wanted to know if I would like to have all the negroes of Mississippi and Louisiana sent to New Hampshire. I tell you what it is, sir, it is a poor soil and a hard climate, and I do not think it would be healthy for them, but very unhealthy. So far as we have a colored population there—and they are very few, less even than in Massachusetts—my intercourse with them has not taught me to believe that they are vicious and depraved beyond people of the same condition of the other complexion; but the contrary, that they are industrious, patient, exhibiting very many amiable and excellent traits of character.

I am going to say this for the colored people, not of my own State, but of the city of Boston: that one of the proudest monuments that I have of my past history, humble as it is, is a testimonial presented to me, since I have been a member of the Senate, by the colored citizens of the city of Boston, for standing up against the oppressions which the General Government undertook to practice upon them in enforcing the fugitive slave law. I was called upon, as a humble member of my profession, to defend them. I did it to the best of my ability; and whatever that ability may be, I will tell you this: the Government never got a verdict against them. Wherever there was a verdict, we got it. The colored citizens of Boston, of their own accord, without any knowledge or suggestion of mine, or any of my friends, came forward and presented to me a set of eight volumes of the Pictorial History of England, as a testimony of the fidelity and zeal with which I had spoken for those who could not speak for themselves. I shall leave it to those who inherit my name as one of the proudest of the inheritances which I can give them; and God knows they are small enough anyhow.

Another one that I have also received, and I will speak of it in that connection, has been from the sailors for helping to abolish flogging in the Navy. I have stood, sir, in the humble sphere in which Providence and my constituents have called on me to stand, as the foe of oppression against any class or any complexion, black or white. I stood against the oppression that was practiced upon the sailor; and when you undertook, by an unjust and an unconstitutional act to oppress and disfranchise the officer, I was opposed to that. I was opposed to oppressing the common sailor, or the officer who wore the epaulets, or the negro who performed the menial service. It is because this constitution says the free negro shall not have a right to go into Oregon, or to work or maintain a suit there, that I am opposed to it.

I believe just exactly what the Senator from Massachusetts believes; and I am going to manifest my belief, not by sitting still and not voting, but by voting against this constitution. I do not care when a State comes here, what it calls itself, whether it calls itself a free State or a slave State. If it comes with a constitution that is essentially unjust in its features and provisions, you cannot blind my eye to that injustice because it comes here perpetrated under the forms of a free State. No, sir, I should as lief have a State come and call itself a slave State as call itself a free State, if it has in its constitution provisions in relation to this unfortunate class that my judgment cannot approve.

Sir, we are asked if we want these men amongst us. I am not going to answer that question; but I will say this: Providence has placed them here; they are a part of us; they are a part of our people; and they are here on God Almighty's earth, which He made for His children to dwell upon, of every race and every nation; and I do not believe that it is morally or politically right for us to say that these people, whom the providence of God, or our own avarice, or the avarice of our own ancestors, has brought here, shall be subjected to perpetual disabilities. If they may not go into Oregon, and if we may shut them out there, why may not every other State make the same provision, until you will not leave them a resting-place on the foot of this green earth, which was made for man? I will not consent to it. Sir, I will not take Oregon now, next winter, or at any time this side of eternity, as long as she incorporates into her constitution a provision that a black man shall not go there, shall have no rights there, and shall maintain no suit there.

I am not going to assail any slave State, or I believe it is more agreeable to some gentlemen to call them slaveholding States. I would just as soon call them slaveholding States instead of slave States, only that it is a large word, and takes longer to speak it. [Laughter.] That is all the difference, in my mind. It is not invidious. I believe it was the Senator from Missouri who made that suggestion. I am not going to find fault with them if, intrenched behind their constitutional rights, they exclude free negroes from their midst. Let them do it. As long as their constitutions are not within my reach, I will not complain. But, sir, this is within our reach. Gentlemen say a constitution must be republican in form. Well, what is republican? What does it mean?

I ask if a republic, or a republican form of government, is one that makes fundamental distinctions between races? Can that be said to be a republic, or, to use that good old word of Oliver Cromwell's time, can it be said to be a Commonwealth, which I believe is the literal and fair translation of that old Latin noun Respublica? It is not republican, as I understand the word; it is not a republican constitution, which picks out this man and that man, and says you shall never come upon the soil; no matter what aggressions may be committed against your person, your reputation, your liberty, you shall have no redress in our courts, and you shall have no place, so far as our voice and our jurisdiction can extend, to rest your foot on this whole broad earth. That is what they say, and that is the right they claim. If they can get it they may have it, but they will never get it by my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Virginia before I vote. He said that there had been some new evidences of advance in this matter, and he referred us to a law which had been recently passed by the Legislature of Virginia, which provided that no free negroes, who had been emancipated since 1806, should be allowed to remain in Virginia. Was that it? I understood the Senator to say that that was an evidence of the enlightenment of this age, an evidence of a great moral, intellectual, and social advance.

Mr. MASON. I did not say it was an evidence of any advance at all on the part of the State of Virginia, but that it was evidence of the necessity in which she found herself placed; that the two classes of the African race could not exist together as bond and free. I stated that by the law of Virginia, passed I do not recollect when, but after 1806, it is provided that all negroes emancipated after 1806, should leave the State. I did not allude to it as an evidence of any intellectual or social advancement, but as evidence of the necessity of her condition, that if her people would emancipate negroes they must not stay there.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understood the argument the Senator was using, that fact, together with the fact that the free States were unwilling to take these blacks, to show that there had been some new light on this subject of recent date, I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MASON. The Senator did not exactly understand the scope of my suggestion. It was this: that the negro race being on this continent, and to far the greatest extent in bondage, the experience of the slaveholding States had shown that they could not exist in the same community as bond and free; and now the experience of the free States has shown that they cannot have free negroes among them; and what seemed to me to be the result of that experience was that the negroes themselves were realizing their true social condition and were applying for legislation. I stated that legislation had been obtained in my own State, and I perceived recently in the State of Texas, by which free negroes were permitted to choose masters and go back voluntarily to slavery. I expressed the hope—though, perhaps, it was a little utopian—that by the action of the friends of the negroes in the free States, the result would be to make them all slaves.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, sir—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island, that as the hour is late, unless he proposes to finish to-night, I shall move an adjournment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to yield to a motion to adjourn; but I thought, perhaps, it was desired to take the vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I see that we cannot get a vote now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask a few more questions before the vote is taken, but if there is any desire on the part of the Senate for an adjournment, I have no objection.

On motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, the Senate adjourned.

LIGHT-HOUSE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COMINS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Commerce the annual light-house appropriation bill, in order that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

There being no objection, a bill making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I submit that the regular order of business is the consideration of the Minnesota bill, and the motion to recommit. That is the unfinished business.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I take it that that can hardly come up in the morning hour. It is not a report of a committee.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If it is the general desire of the House to devote an hour to the call of committees for reports, I have no objection to that course being pursued.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I thank the gentleman from Georgia. This is the last day on which the Committee on Foreign Affairs can report under the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before general consent is given, I desire to know precisely what the proposition is.

The SPEAKER. It is that the committees be called for one hour for reports. Is there objection?

No objection was made.

SCHOOL FUND IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. FERGUSON, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to protect the land fund, for school purposes, in Sarpy county, Nebraska Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FRANCISCO LOPEZ URRIZA.

Mr. RITCHIE. I made a report yesterday from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, adverse to the claim of Francisco Lopez Urriza; and I now ask that the papers in that case be withdrawn from the files of the House, and that they be referred to the Court of Claims. I think it is a proper case for the action of that court.

It was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to yield to me a moment in order that I may ask leave to withdraw certain papers.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to everything that is not in the regular order.

FRENCH SPOILIATION BILL.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I take the floor, then, to submit a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on French spoliations. The bill which I report is a copy of the bill which was vetoed by President Pierce. It makes no direct appropriation, and therefore does not require a committal.

Mr. SEWARD. I thought the gentleman yesterday got the floor, by consent, to submit some reports from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that it was the general understanding he should occupy the floor this morning on the Clayton-Bulwer question. I did not understand that he was to come here and submit other reports this morning.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports was suspended yesterday with the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BURNETT. I thought it was the understanding that the gentleman from North Carolina would occupy the floor this morning by general consent. The regular order I understand to be the Minnesota bill. I thought it was the understanding that the gentleman took the floor by general consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand it. The understanding was, that one hour should be devoted to reports from committees.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 1st day of July, 1801; and I am also instructed to move that its further consideration be postponed for two weeks from this day. Gentlemen may prefer its committal to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Of course I have no right to give any direction to the matter. If any gentleman desires to make that motion he can do so.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. BARKSDALE. This is an important bill, and it strikes me that it ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I make that motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I made the motion that the report of the committee be postponed to the 19th day of May, and ordered to be printed; but I withdraw it for the reception of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SEWARD. If I have the floor, I move that the subject be postponed until the 15th day of February next.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I withdraw my motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion to lay upon the table, and the House disagree to the postponement, I will then move myself that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHORTER. Is an amendment in order to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SHORTER. I move that the bill be postponed to the first Monday in January next.

Mr. FAULKNER. Does that bill make an appropriation of money? If so, I would like to know whether, under the rules of the House, it should not go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Neither of the motions now pending renders it necessary for the Chair to determine that question. The Chair has not examined the bill. The question to postpone may be taken without the necessity of a decision of the question of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Has the gentleman from Mississippi withdrawn the motion to lay upon the table?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I call for the previous question.

Mr. SEWARD. Was my motion to postpone to the 10th day of February entertained?

The SPEAKER. It was not. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] had the floor at the time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As the call for the previous question cuts off the motion to postpone, I ask for a division on seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the previous question be seconded, what will be its effect?

The SPEAKER. It will cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. GREENWOOD. What will be the next question?

The SPEAKER. The motion to commit.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then let us take the vote on the postponement of the subject. If that be voted down, then the bill can be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Does that bring the House to a direct vote on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to a vote on the motion to commit; and, if that be voted down, then the question will be on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would like to have a question about this bill decided. I believe the rule requires that all propositions touching appropriations of money shall first be considered in a Committee of the Whole House. Now, sir, while this bill may be drawn so as not to make an appropriation directly, it provides, as I understand, for the issuance of five millions of United States bonds; it provides for commissioners at salaries of $3,000, and various persons at other salaries, and that certainly touches appropriations of money, though it may not directly make an appropriation; because, if this bill passes, appropriations must as naturally follow as one thing can follow another. It certainly has direct relation to an appropriation; and comes, in my opinion, within the rule which requires all bills of that character to be first considered in Committee of the Whole House. If I recollect the rule, it does not say "propositions making appropriations," but "touching appropriations."

The SPEAKER. The language is, "all proceedings touching appropriations of money shall first be considered in Committee of the Whole House."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This certainly does touch an appropriation of money.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has anticipated the question of order. When the matter properly arises, the Chair will decide the question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think now is the time, for if that shall be the decision of the Chair, the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. There is a proposition to postpone. It is competent for the House to postpone without the question arising whether the bill must be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I suggest that we take the vote by tellers, on the question whether it shall be postponed or not; and if that is not carried we will all agree to commit the bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I insist upon the previous question. That, if sustained, will bring the House directly to a vote upon referring to a Committee of the Whole House, and that is my object.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to inquire, if the previous question is sustained, and the House refuses to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, whether the bill would not be put directly upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. If the question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee should be decided adversely to the views of that gentleman, it would be.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the previous question; and Messrs. CLEMENS and ANDREWS were appointed.

Mr. PHILLIPS. In order that there may be a direct vote upon the proposition, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

No objection being made, the demand was withdrawn.

The question was first upon the amendment of Mr. SHORTER to postpone until the 15th day of January next.

Mr. SHORTER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and ANDREWS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The motion as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the postponement was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

E. G. SQUIER.

Mr. SICKLES, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of E. George Squier, of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now report the resolution which I presented yesterday, but withdrew. Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from North Carolina give way that I may offer a substitute?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina whether he has reported a simple resolution or a joint resolution?

Mr. CLINGMAN. They are simply House resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That inasmuch as the United States can never consent that any foreign Power shall have the right to enter our territory with a view of forcibly carrying away any person who may be therein, so it becomes the duty of this Government to disavow and disclaim all right on its part to enter for the same purpose the territory of any foreign Power or State with which we are on terms of amity or friendship.

Resolved, That officers of the United States have no right to use the force under their command in the territory of any foreign State, at the instance of, or for the benefit of, such State, unless previously authorized by Congress.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the views of the President, as made known in his message to the two Houses of Congress, are in accordance with these principles, no action is necessary on the part of Congress.

Mr. RITCHIE. I ask now that my resolution be read, which expresses the sentiments of a portion of a minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and which I submit as a substitute for the pending resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and the same are hereby, presented to Commodore Hiram Paulding, and through him to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines, attached to the squadron under his command, for the capture, on the 8th of December last, at Punta Arenas, of one William Walker, and others associated with him, who were engaged in carrying on against the Government and people of Nicaragua an unlawful military enterprise, which was set on foot by the said Walker and his associates within the territory and in violation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution, as a substitute, which expresses the sentiments of another portion of the minority of that committee.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the conduct of Commodore Paulding, in capturing General William Walker and his men at Punta Arenas, in Nicaragua, was without the authority of law, and meets the condemnation of this House.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I ask now that my resolutions be read.

They were reported, as follows:

Resolved, That the capture of William Walker on the coasts of Nicaragua by Commodore Paulding, was without authority of law.

Resolved, That said capture was within the letter and spirit of the instructions of the Department of the Navy, ordering one of its officers "to repair with his vessel to Chiriqui, where it had reason to believe said expedition would rendezvous," and another to proceed with his vessel to Cape Gracias, Honduras, skirting along the coasts, looking in at the mouth of Bluefield inlet, thence to San Juan del Norte, Nicaragua.

Resolved, That the right of the citizen of the United States to expatriate himself and transfer his allegiance to other Governments; to "emigrate with arms in his hands" for the purpose of settling new countries and founding new States, is an inherent and sacred right, one that ought to be inviolate, and one of which he cannot be constitutionally deprived.

WILLIAM G. MOREHEAD.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made an adverse report in the case of William G. Morehead; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

JOHN H. WHEELER.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with copies of the papers on file in his Department, in relation to the claim of John H. Wheeler, late Minister to Nicaragua, for losses charged to have been sustained by him for discounts on drafts for his salary, together with the grounds on which the said claim was discharged by the Treasury Department.

ARREST OF WALKER.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House I will make some explanation of the report made from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the arrest of General Walker by Commodore Paulding. It will be remembered, at an early day of this session I offered some resolutions, in the following words:

Resolved, That the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, designated as the Clayton Bulwer treaty, being, under the interpretation placed on it by Great Britain, an entire surrender of the rights of this country, and, upon the American construction, an entangling alliance without mutuality either in its benefits or restrictions, and having hitherto been productive only of misunderstandings and controversies between the two Governments, ought therefore to be abrogated.

Resolved, That since the acquisition and settlement of our territory on the Pacific, certain portions of Central America stand to us in a relation similar to that which Louisiana, prior to its acquisition, bore to our territory in the Mississippi valley, and, therefore, ought not to be subject to the control of any foreign Power that might interfere materially with our interests.

Resolved, That inasmuch as the Government of the United States has heretofore taken steps to suppress the African slave trade, and is at present subjecting itself to a considerable annual expense to keep up a squadron on the coast of Africa to prevent the same, we feel it to be our duty to protest against the trade in white men, commonly called the Cooly trade, not only on principles of humanity with reference to the subjects of that traffic, but also because it is eminently injurious in its ultimate effects to the countries to which they are transported."

They indicate the line of policy upon which I expect to speak to-day; but before doing so I desire to offer a few words on the subject of this Paulding report.

It takes the ground that he, Commodore Paulding, had no authority to arrest General Walker in Nicaragua. It has been said that pirates may be followed into any jurisdiction, and there has been an attempt to liken this case to that. On that point, I can refer to a very high authority. Mr. Webster, in his letter to Mr. Fox, says:

"Her Majesty's Government are pleased, also, to speak of those American citizens who took part with persons in Canada engaged in an insurrection against the British Government, as 'American pirates.' The undersigned does not admit the propriety or justice of this designation. If citizens of the United States fitted out, or were engaged in fitting out, a military expedition from the United States, intended to act against the British Government in Canada, they were clearly violating the laws of their own country, and exposing themselves to the just consequences which might be inflicted on them if taken within the British dominions. But, notwithstanding this, they were certainly not pirates, nor does the undersigned think that it can advance the purpose of fair and friendly discussion, or hasten the accommodation of national difficulties, so to denominate them. Their offense, whatever it was, had no analogy to cases of piracy. Supposing all that is alleged against them to be true, they were taking a part in what they regarded as a civil war, and they were taking a part on the side of the rebels. Surely England herself has not regarded persons thus engaged as deserving the appellation which her Majesty's Government bestows on these citizens of the United States."

"It is quite notorious that, for the greater part of the last two centuries, subjects of the British Crown have been permitted to engage in foreign wars, both national and civil, and in the latter in every stage of their progress; and yet it has not been imagined that England has at any time allowed her subjects to turn pirates. Indeed, in our own times, not only have individual subjects of that Crown gone abroad to engage in civil wars, but we have seen whole regiments openly recruited, embodied, armed, and disciplined, in England, with the avowed purpose of aiding a rebellion against a nation with which England was at peace."

I will remind the House, in addition to that strong authority, that when General Felix Houston proposed to raise an expedition to help the Greeks in their revolution, John Quincy Adams, then President of the United States, Henry Clay, then Secretary of State, Daniel Webster, Forsyth, and La Fayette, gave him strong letters of recommendation. La Fayette himself was an illustrious example of that kind of piracy. In the debate which took place in the House some time ago, it was urged that Paulding had a right to follow Walker as a criminal into the jurisdiction of Nicaragua, and arrest him. This is contrary to the law of nations; and if gentlemen will take the trouble to look into the extradition treaties which have been entered into with Great Britain, with Switzerland, and with other countries, they will find that those countries have recognized no such right as this; nor has the right, in any case, been conceded, but only the right to make a demand on the executives. The Nicaraguan Minister could not have given any such authority. It is an authority which can be granted only by the treaty-making power. Mr. Dallas could not authorize any English captain to come into the United States for such a purpose; that could only be done by the President and Senate, as the treaty-making power.

But it is argued, in the third place, that Paulding went there for the benefit of Nicaragua. Well, sir, upon that point I have to say that an officer in charge of the United States forces can only use those forces in the service of the United States. That proposition, I think, is indisputable. What the last House of Representatives thought on that subject, I beg leave to show, by presenting the vote upon a resolution of my own.

I will say to the House, in explanation of the circumstances under which I offered that resolution, that immediately after the Panama outbreak and the slaughter of our people occurred, I went to see the late Secretary of State, Mr. Marcy, and advised at once that a body of troops should be sent down to protect the Panama railroad. I called Mr. Marcy's attention to the fact that the United States had guaranteed the safety of the line by a treaty which was the supreme law of the land. He admitted such was the treaty, but said that the Executive could not use the United States forces within a foreign jurisdiction without the authority of Congress. I reminded him of what had been done at Greytown, and he intimated that they had probably exceeded the law at Greytown; "but," said he, "we will do anything we can do from the guns of our ships, but we cannot land troops there."

I say, Mr. Speaker—because this has been a subject of some discussion lately, and I am a very frank man in politics—that I did press upon the Secretary of State the importance of sending troops there, taking possession of that line, and holding that isthmus as a satisfaction; but agreeing to pay to New Granada a sum of perhaps two or three millions to boot, for a cession to us. That was my line of policy. I desire to hold that isthmus. I also remember very well, that, in the course of that conversation—for I was perhaps a little ultra and pressing in my remarks—in reply to a question of the Secretary of State, as to what we all thought up here in Congress about his foreign policy, I did say to him that, in my judgment, his foreign policy had been irritating and weak; that they had quarreled with everybody, and maintained nothing.

But, sir, it is sufficient for my purpose to say that the Secretary of State thought that there was no authority, and he referred me to the President. I had a conversation with President Pierce on the subject, and he took the same view of it: that, without authority from Congress, the Executive could not use the troops of the United States in any foreign jurisdiction. I therefore presented in the House the following resolution:

"Be it resolved, &c., That for the better protection of the persons and property of American citizens, under the law of nations, and as secured by existing treaty stipulations with reference to the thoroughfares or lines of travel between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to employ any part of the land or naval forces of the country, and to call for and use any number of volunteers that may be necessary to provide for the safety of passengers and others of our citizens in those localities, and to insure the observance of such rights as the Government and citizens of the United States are entitled to enjoy on said transits."

"Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is a proposition authorizing the President to take possession of Central America. [Laughter.] I do not want it here at this time."

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, said that when the resolution came in he should introduce a proposition for the annexation of the British Provinces. After a little discussion the matter went over till the next Monday, and the House adjourned. On the following Monday the vote upon the suspension of the rules was—yeas 53, nays 74. A large majority of Congress were unwilling to allow me to introduce a resolution of that sort authorizing the President of the United States to use the troops to protect the lives of American citizens on that line, because in a foreign jurisdiction? Why? Because they feared the President might take possession of Central America, or annex it, or involve us in war. Of course, if the President is not to be trusted, I suppose gentlemen will not trust his subordinates, either officers in the Army or Navy, to do the same thing. But the question is, whether Paulding had a right to do what he did in the absence of any act of Congress. I think everybody will agree, upon a moment's reflection, that that is a proposition which is not debatable; and hence, in this report, I maintain that he had no authority, under the laws of nations, or under the Constitution and laws of the United States, for that act.

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the resolution which I offered in the last Congress, and which I have just read, had been adopted and carried out: what might have been the effect? The President might have occupied the Isthmus of Panama, a narrow neck of territory two or three hundred miles in extent, which would have been of vast advantage to us, it being that narrow isthmus over which the world may find the best connection between the Atlantic and Pacific. Of course, we should have done as we did in the case of California; we should have allowed some balance to New Granada, and paid them whatever amount they were willing to take. Gentlemen may smile; but I see it stated in the papers that the Attorney General of New Granada, who controls that country, is actually asking that it shall all be annexed to the United States for nothing.

But, sir, another purpose which I had very much at heart, was to open this Nicaragua line. Walker, you will recollect, was then in power, and remained in power about a year. Now, if we had opened that line, the effect would have been that men and supplies could have reached William Walker, and I have no doubt that he would have sustained himself in that country. He was overthrown, it will be remembered, by the combined efforts of the Central American States, of Commodore Vanderbilt, and of the British influence against him, and by all the aid the Secretary of State could give in cutting off supplies; and ultimately the capture of his ships and men by Davis, one of our naval officers.

I say, therefore, that it is very obvious to my mind that if my resolution had been adopted and carried out, and communication had thus been opened with him, he would have been sustained, and I have no doubt he would have established a better system than they now have there.

Even now, it would be of vast advantage to this country to have that line opened. It has been closed for more than two years, and the gentleman from California [Mr. McKIBBIN] tells me that the State of California loses at least a million and a half of dollars a year by reason of the stoppage of that line. They charge thirty-three per cent. higher to go by the Panama route than they would by this line. It has been stated in newspapers—whether correctly or not I do not know—that the Panama company is paying $40,000 a month, or $480,000 a year, to keep the Nicaragua line closed. Well, if they are getting $1,500,000 by it, they can afford to pay $480,000, and make a very handsome profit out of it, by reason of the monopoly they thus enjoy.

I may say, in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that I see that a proclamation was issued in New York, on the 22d of April last, by Mr. Yrissarri, and a previous dispatch, of December 30, 1857, in which he announces that if any citizen of the United States goes to Nicaragua or attempts to pass through it to California, as we have a right to do under the original treaty, he will be treated as an enemy, and stopped if he does not go by a certain line, to wit: the Atlantic and Pacific Ship Canal Company. I doubt, sir, if there is anything in our treaty regulations to justify that. I hold that it is the right of every American citizen, we being at peace with Nicaragua, to go to that country in any ship he thinks proper to take. But, if this be true, I submit to gentlemen upon all sides whether a monopoly like this is to be tolerated. True, the company is a New York one, but do the people of New York themselves wish to beat their mercy? Suppose the British Government were to provide that nobody should go to Great Britain unless he went there in the Cunard line of steamers, so as to give them a monopoly and enable them to charge enormously high rates: would not every New Yorker, and much more the people of Boston, Philadelphia and other cities, complain of such a regulation?

I see that in another publication, lately made, it is said that any man who goes to the country without a permit from the Minister, or from his consul at New York, will be treated as an enemy. I hold, sir, that we have a right to exercise an influence upon that country to secure the right of way to our Pacific possessions; and I trust that the treaty-making power of the United States will not allow any regulation to be made by which we are to lose that right. A gentleman [Mr. BINGHAM] on my right asks me if there is any danger of our losing it. Why, that company claims to have the sole right to carry passengers there. Suppose they do not carry any, as they have not carried them for two years or more. The way is blocked up; and I am told, as I have already said, that they are getting $40,000 a month to keep it stopped for the benefit of the Panama company. That is the allegation. But suppose it is not true. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he, as an American citizen, is willing to deprive the people of this country of the right to go to California, unless they go in a particular line of ships? Why, there are not more than five hundred thousand people in that country—mostly Indians and negroes. And are we to allow them to block up our way to our Pacific possessions, unless we choose to submit to an enormous monopoly of that sort?

I conclude what I have to say about Commodore Paulding by simply declaring that the effects of that act of his have been very unfortunate to us. It has been calculated to aid British interests and not American interests in that quarter, and has been properly appreciated in England, and at Havana. All the letters I see from Central America say that, instead of getting credit among the people by that act, we are in, perhaps, worse reputation there than we were previously, because they supposed we were compelled, by Great Britain, to arrest Walker.

This brings me to the consideration of the resolutions that exist between Great Britain and ourselves in regard to Central America, as affected by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I yesterday moved to take up that resolution at one o'clock to-day. If it be agreeable to the House, I will just go on and say what I have to say about it now; but I do not desire to occupy any more of the time of the House than is absolutely necessary. I made that motion for one o'clock, under the impression that the House did not meet till twelve.

A MEMBER. What do you propose about the Paulding resolutions?

Mr. CLINGMAN. My motion is to commit the resolutions to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to have them printed. The matter will then be open to discussion. With the leave of the House, I will now take up that other question, and say what I have to say about it.

Mr. SICKLES. I would suggest to the gentleman to let the present motion stand as it is. I desire to present some views, on the part of the committee, before it takes that direction.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Well, I hope that gentleman will allow me to go to this other matter.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman from North Carolina; but my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] wishes to be heard, and he has as much right to the floor as any other member.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My motion will leave the subject in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the gentleman's colleague, and any other member who desires to be heard upon it, can there be heard.

Mr. SICKLES. Or, if the matter be left as it is, the subject will come up in the morning hour to-morrow, and the gentleman will have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Very well; I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire simply to know whether this will affect the morning hour, as far as reports of committees are concerned?

The SPEAKER. In what respect?

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand that one o'clock to-day was fixed for taking up this subject. I presume that if the gentleman be permitted to go on now, it will interfere with the morning hour, so as to prevent the committees from presenting reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia will remember that the call of committees cannot be resumed until this question is disposed of.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Other gentlemen will speak on it now, if I do not; and so the balance of the morning hour will be consumed.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] desire to be heard this morning?

Mr. SICKLES. No, sir. We can both be heard to-morrow morning.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object to anything out of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall object to any arrangement not consistent with the rules. My colleague has just as much right to be heard as any other member, on the matter before the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If I must go on and speak on this subject of Paulding, I will do so; but I do not wish to do so.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I believe that the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina yesterday was, that the subject should be postponed till one o'clock to-day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Yes.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then the gentleman from Georgia can make a speech this morning.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It will come up in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. COBB. I enter my protest against any further proposition to interfere with the call of committees for reports. I want that distinctly understood now. If I am out of my seat at any time when such propositions come up, I hope the Speaker will bear my objection in mind. I wish to have all the committees regularly called. This matter presented by the gentleman from North Carolina will occupy the morning hour for the balance of the session, if it is to be considered then.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand whether there is any objection on the part of the House to the gentleman from North Carolina proceeding in his remarks on the report which he yesterday submitted, and which was postponed to one o'clock to-day?

Mr. COBB. What effect will that have on the other question?

The SPEAKER. It will come up in the morning.

Mr. COBB. Then I object. Let us dispose of it to-day.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his objection, for this reason: this motion to postpone was made yesterday, and I objected to it for the same reason that the gentleman from Alabama objects now. I concur with him in wishing to have the morning hour every day consumed by the call of committees for reports. But the motion to postpone was made under the impression that the House met at twelve o'clock instead of eleven. I think that if the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his objection, and let the gentleman from North Carolina proceed now, it will advance the business of the House, and promote the object we both have in view.

Mr. COBB. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I should not consume as much time, if allowed to go on now, as I would if I have to wait till one o'clock, as I am not very well, and am somewhat fatigued now.

Mr. SEWARD. I am opposed to moving with two things at once, and I object, except it be in order.

Mr. RITCHIE. I hope my colleague will permit the subject of Commodore Paulding to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and then it can be discussed there fully.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that the gentleman from North Carolina wishes to be absent for some days. I therefore withdraw my objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not feel very well to-day, but in the discharge of my public duty I will proceed with my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a struggle going on between the United States and Great Britain for some years, in regard to this Central American country. It commenced with the acquisition of California, and the gold discoveries there. Before that time Great Britain had been exerting her influence without interruption from us; but as soon as she saw that the United States, by the passing of her citizens to California, would have advantages in, and would probably acquire that country, she made a proposition to us through Sir Henry Bulwer, which our Administration, exhibiting, as I hold, great imbecility, adopted. I think we were circumvented in it; and it is that proposition which I now desire this House to consider, and which—if gentlemen will examine it—I believe every one on this floor will in his conscience pronounce to have been a great blunder.

The ostensible object of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to provide for opening the route to California; but unfortunately that part of it has not been executed. That would have been advantageous. Its great feature, so objectionable, is the first article, which provides that neither Great Britain nor the United States shall ever occupy, colonize, fortify, or assume or exercise, any jurisdiction over Central America, or any portion of it, either directly or indirectly, by any treaty with any Power, or by reason of any protectorate, &c. It is an agreement between both Governments by which neither is ever to take possession of that country, to the end of all time. It has been called a Wilmot proviso, but it is vastly more objectionable than the old Wilmot proviso.

We of the South have thought that a denial of the right to expand was unjust. It was a denial by congressional legislation, but a denial which our Government, where we were represented, had imposed and might remove, and which they did remove in fact. But this Clayton-Bulwer treaty is a Wilmot proviso imposed by a foreign Government against the growth not only of the South, but likewise of the North, and of the whole United States; declaring that in all time we shall not touch that country and occupy it. Great Britain herself is a little island, less in extent than several States in this Union; yet she has, by conquest and filibustering generally, acquired three times as much territory as the United States have. Great Britain, which, like that fabled giant of old, has its hundred arms out in all directions, seizing territory everywhere, because she sees that the United States might have the advantage in Central America, says to us, "hands off!" and our Government assents to it. Is it not, when stated, a monstrous proposition, that the limbs of this young, growing, and free Republic should be bound by any such treaty through all time? Why, Mr. Speaker, suppose we should say to Great Britain, we will agree that you and we will never take any portion of Asia: Great Britain would laugh at us; she would tell us that we had no possessions or interest there, and had no right to expect her to make any such agreement. Suppose we should say to her, "neither of us will touch any islands in the Red Sea, and especially the island of Perim, which you are now fortifying." Great Britain would say, "though we have no possessions within a thousand miles of that island, yet it lies directly between us and our possessions in the East, and therefore there is no mutuality in the proposition, and we will not make the treaty."

Being encouraged, however, by her success in this Clayton-Bulwer matter, she proposed a similar agreement in relation to Cuba; but the American people had been aroused, and understood the effect and folly of such a policy, and Mr. Everett and Mr. Fillmore declined the proposition. If it had been adopted, the next movement would have been in reference to Mexico, and our hands would have been completely tied by a great Power which is constantly acquiring territory in all parts of the world. Remember, sir, that this is the effect of our own American construction of this treaty. By our own interpretation of it our hands will be tied for all time. But we have not even the poor consolation that she is also bound. After the treaty was made, Great Britain said, "by its terms we are allowed to hold all we now possess, but we will not take any more; and, as you have got nothing there, you will take nothing." I need not argue against the absurdity of such a proposition. Suppose A and B are contending for a house, and A has possession of four of the five rooms in it; but there being one vacant room remaining, he proposes to B that neither of them shall occupy any part of that house, or exercise any control over it. It is agreed to; but after the contract has been executed, A says: "I am not to give up the four rooms I now hold, but I am not to take that fifth room, and you are to let it alone likewise, and to stay out of doors." What would be said of such an arrangement? Now, to show that such is the case in the present instance, if gentlemen will look at this map, printed by order of the Senate two years ago, [here Mr. C. held up the map before the House,] they will see that this red line shows the British claim. They will find that it covers four fifths of the eastern coast of Central America. Why, sir, that claim has been refuted by argument a hundred times. Mr. Buchanan himself argued it ably. If gentlemen will look at the speech of Senator SEWARD, made two years ago, they will find an able argument to show that Great Britain had no right whatever to hold one foot of that territory. Mr. SEWARD said that, sooner than submit to her pretension, we ought to have a war with her. But he makes an argument, founded on the evils of war, and recommends continued negotiation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Does the gentleman from North Carolina concur in the views of Senator SEWARD?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will say to the gentleman that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Whether we shall go to war to resist this British assumption is a matter for another occasion; but I was showing how perfectly convinced Governor SEWARD was as to the injustice of her claim, to resist which he was willing to go to war. He recommends that we should negotiate further—a most lame and impotent conclusion; for we have been negotiating with her for the last eight years, and we have not yet succeeded in getting a settlement from her. If gentlemen would like to know with what rapidity negotiations with her progress, let them look back to her negotiations with Spain, and they will find that, for two hundred years, Spain had been trying to get her out of that country, and was not able to do it with all the treaties that could be made.

The truth is, that the British Government has been strengthening itself in these possessions, and has held them for eight years, and she cannot, honorably, back out from the construction she has stood on so long. It was the proposition, however, of an Administration which has gone out of power, and one which the present feeling of England and the present Administration would, perhaps, not originally have indorsed. I think, therefore, with President Buchanan, that the true mode of meeting this issue is to abrogate the treaty, and to leave negotiation to arise upon it hereafter.

But I am met with this idea by gentlemen. The resolution reported by the committee is a declaration against both the British and American construction of the treaty, and recommends that the President take steps for its abrogation. But some gentlemen say that the President and Senate are the treaty-making power; and it is indelicate for this House to ever express an opinion on such a subject. There are some questions of such vast moment that the representatives of the people have the right to look into them. Suppose there was a proposition to annex all Mexico or Brazil to the United States: will it be contended that the representatives of the American people have not the right to express their opinion upon it, when every town meeting or popular gathering in the country has the right to do so? Remember that we are, in fact, the war-making power, and that treaties often lead to war. We have to vote the money to carry them out, frequently, and therefore we must have the right to look into them. In England, whence we get our notions of parliamentary law, and of our rights to a great extent, though the King has the power to declare war and to make treaties without consulting either branch of Parliament, yet, in the House of Commons, they have always held that they have the right to discuss those questions, to ask for explanations, or to refuse supplies; and many ministers have been turned out because not sustained by the House of Commons, on mere questions of foreign policy. And will it be contended that what the House of Commons may do in a monarchy, the Representatives of the American people cannot do?

We have a Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to that committee has been referred this identical message of the President of the United States, in which he strongly condemns this treaty, and says it ought to be abrogated. The rules of this House require the committees to report upon everything which is referred to them. That committee was obliged to report; and the most limited report we could make was a resolution expressive simply of our opinion. We have not gone so far as to recommend action. I think, therefore, that every gentleman will see in a moment that this is the proper mode of proceeding. We do not trammel the President at all, but propose to back him. In my judgment, the President will find, if this old stumbling-block is removed, that a satisfactory arrangement may be made outside of it. Be that as it may, I am willing to leave the whole matter with him. But there are some questions of expediency of vast moment involved, and I will bring some of them to the consideration of the House.

By the abrogation of this treaty we shall open that country ultimately to the occupation of citizens of the United States. A great advantage will result from our occupation, as well to that country as to us. In all ages of the world, where the higher races have had control of the greater portion of the earth, it has been most prosperous. There are now, Mr. Speaker, four Powers which are extending their dominion over inferior races. In the northeast there is the great Russian Empire, which has sprung up in modern times, but it now holds one half of Europe, all the north of Asia, and has an area of eight million square miles, and a population of sixty-five millions, and is extending its dominion over the semi-barbarous nations of Asia. Whatever may be thought of the Russian Government as compared with our own, I think that all men will agree that the system it will establish will be more stable and more conducive to the material prosperity of those countries than their present system.

The second Power is that which exists in southwestern Europe on a comparatively small area. The French Empire in Europe, including the island of Corsica, consists of only two hundred and five thousand square miles—less than the area of the State of Texas. But there is in that territory a population of nearly forty million people—active, energetic, highly civilized, intelligent and brave, and constituting, in my opinion, the most formidable military Power that the sun has ever shone upon. If the ascendancy of France is not as striking as was that of imperial Rome, it is because her neighbors and rivals are vastly superior to the semi-barbarous nations over which the Roman eagles directed their victorious flight. France is now occupying northern Africa, and I have no doubt that civilization will be benefited by it.

The third Power is that which rests on a little island in the Atlantic ocean—an island less than several States of this Union. But its dominions have been extended to every zone, till they girdle the entire globe. Great Britain controls a larger amount of the earth's area than has been ever heretofore subjected to one Government. She has under her dominion more than two hundred million people—nearly one fourth of the whole human race. She has subjected to her every variety of men, from the Caucasian down to the negro.

The fourth Power is that which exists on this western continent. It has sprung up so suddenly, and its progress has been so rapid, compared with the old empires, that it reminds me of the vision of Daniel, of the he-goat that came from the West so rapidly that he touched not the ground. It is only a little more than fifty years since Talleyrand said that the United States was a young giant without bones or nerves. Since that day, however, the bone has been hardening, the muscles swelling, and the sinews toughening; and the United States now stands among the great Powers of the earth. We have a territory of about three million square miles—as much as imperial Rome had in her palmiest days; and though only one third as much as the territory of England or even of Russia, yet when you consider the compactness of this country and its qualities, it is vastly superior to either. At least two thirds of the territory of the United States is capable of settlement. If it was all settled up as densely as Massachusetts and as Rhode Island are, it would have a population of above two hundred million—more than all Europe now has. We have a front on both the great oceans. We have the Gulf of Mexico—our western Mediterranean—on our southern border. Napoleon I. attempted to make the European Mediterranean a French lake, and failed in it. If the United States are true to themselves they will make the Gulf of Mexico a great American lake, supplied by that grand artery which drains the magnificent Mississippi basin. When you remember, therefore, the character of our territory, its compactness, its fertility, its favorable climate, and its productions, with its active, intelligent, and moral population, it must be admitted by every one that there is no Power on earth which has greater advantages than we have.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we, too, have subjected to our control some of the inferior races. Let us, for a moment, draw a comparison between the United States and these other Powers. I will take Great Britain, not only because she is most like us, but because she makes the greatest pretensions to enlarged philanthropy, civilization, and general humanity, and because she holds a great variety of races under her dominion; but especially because the real question is, "shall Great Britain or the United States control this Central American country?" Let us make the comparison, then. Great Britain has subjected to her in India one hundred and seventy million people. The Government, in large sections, owns the land, and obliges the occupants to cultivate it as tenants. Lord Brougham, in one of his speeches in the British Parliament, said that eighteen twentieths of the gross products of the soil were drawn away from its cultivators in certain localities. No man believes that the inhabitants of any country can live on the one tenth of all the products, or even one fourth—perhaps not one half, if you take a large district into view. And therefore, according to Bishop Heber and other British writers, millions of people die in India annually from oppression and famine. Some men have said—whether truly or not I cannot tell—that the population of that country has diminished by thirty million since Great Britain got control of it. But this much is certain: a few years ago the British Government sent a commission to India to examine into its condition; and it reported that to collect taxes torture was applied to the tenants, and that hundreds of thousands of men and women die annually under these tortures, because they do not pay up their small rents.

Now, I will do Englishmen the justice to say, that in my judgment they cannot approve of any such thing. I am satisfied that the Government itself does not sanction it. That country is governed by the East India Company—a great filibustering company, chartered to acquire territory for the British Government, and retained for that purpose. Corporations are habitually soulless.

Now look, for a moment, at the manner in which we have treated the aborigines of this country. Since the formation of the Constitution of the United States, I do not believe that we have ever deprived any Indian tribe of property. Wherever we have acquired their territory we have given them an equivalent. There is not an Indian tribe in the United States that has not more land than it can cultivate. And so far from compelling them to labor and pay taxes, we actually expend large sums for keeping them alive.

Again, sir, the United States and Great Britain have both been large importers of negro slaves to America. Into the United States there have been brought nearly four hundred thousand negro slaves, and they have increased to four million—ten times the original number. Into the British colonies there have been one million seven hundred thousand imported; and the proportionate increase would have made them at the present time seventeen million. But, in point of fact, there are only six hundred thousand. Into Jamaica alone, the British and Spaniards have carried eight hundred and ninety thousand negroes; and at the emancipation, in 1835, there were only three hundred and eleven thousand left—one third of the original number. I need not enlarge on the fact of the vast increase of slaves in this country, of their condition being above that which their race has ever occupied anywhere, and of their immense productions. Compare that with the degraded position of the British islands. Great Britain, however, emancipated her slaves, and the consequence has been that her colonies are lapsing into barbarism and savagery. To relieve her islands from their unfortunate and desolate condition, Great Britain has adopted another expedient—the importation of large bodies of white men as slaves, under the name of the Coolie trade.

Gentlemen may perhaps remember that during the last session I had occasion to make a speech, in which I discussed this subject. I suppose that in the course of that speech I had commented on some of the transactions of the Secretary of State in a manner that may not have been entirely acceptable; at any rate, in two or three days after, there appeared in a newspaper in this city—a paper which represents the foreign interest always—what purported to be an extract from a report in progress in the State Department, giving an account of the condition of the Coolies in Peru, and stating that they had a perfect paradise there. And this thing was published as a reply to my speech. I should not have objected to its being put in juxtaposition with it, provided they had thought proper to publish my speech, so that their readers could decide for themselves.

Now, if gentlemen will look into the seventh volume of the Commercial Statistics, they will see all the information that Mr. Marcy and his assistants were able to collect on this important subject; and it does not make one page. It would be well for gentlemen to read it, to see how little truth there may be in an official report. It deserves to stand side by side with that passage in the old geographies, which represented Indians as venturing over the Falls of Niagara, in their canoes, in safety. The two statements are equally reliable. I was anxious to make a reply to it at the time; but, under the rules of the House, I had no opportunity afforded me.

I now ask the attention of the House for a few moments, while I expose one of the most oppressive, cruel, and monstrous systems that the world has ever seen carried on by any civilized nation. I shall first read a few extracts from the daily papers of the last few weeks, among the items of telegraphic and other news. I may repeat that this report represents the Coolies in Peru as having a fine time of it, and as being thriving, prosperous, and happy. Whereas, in fact, it is established that of those Coolies who are imported in Peruvian ships, thirty-eight per cent.—a little over one third—die on the passage. Nor do those carried in American and British ships fare much better, as these extracts show:

"On the 19th the American ship, Kitty Simpson, from Swatara and St. Helena, with three hundred and thirty-seven Asiatics. She had ninety-three deaths on the passage. And on the 20th, the British ship Admiral, with two hundred and eighty-three Asiatics. She had ninety deaths on the passage."

"It is worthy of remark that the number of deaths has always been proportionate to the length of the passage, and I cannot omit drawing particular attention to the fact that all these Asiatics brought here are males, not a single female having arrived among the twenty-four thousand and upwards that have come to this island. Is not this the very refinement of cruelty?"

"Besides, this trade has not even the sorry excuse of the African slave trade. The Africans are savages, whom, it may be said, it is charity to civilize and Christianize; the Asiatics are far from being savages; many of them are persons of refined habits and considerable education."—New York Herald.

"CUBA.—LATEST NEWS.—By the steamer Black Warrior intelligence has been received from Havana to the 15th instant. It is reported that two cargoes of negroes had been landed in Cuba since the last advices, and duly disposed of. Two American ships had also arrived from China with cargoes of Coolies. The ship Challenge, Captain Kinney, one hundred and thirty-seven days from Swatara, landed at Havana six hundred and twenty Asiatics. During the passage two hundred and eighty-six had died." * * *

"From the 10th of April, 1855, to the 15th instant, seventeen thousand six hundred and forty-four Asiatics have been received in Cuba for eight years' servitude, of which more than twenty per cent. have already disappeared. On the vessels engaged in this traffic, three thousand one hundred and seventeen have died during the voyages by suicide or disease, being more than one sixth of the whole number taken on board. This does not include casualties, mutinies, &c., which have caused the destruction of whole cargoes. Of some three or four thousand received previous to the 10th of April, 1855, nearly all have perished. It is not probable that a tenth will remain at the close of their eight years. It is said that an arrival of sepoy is expected, to add to the heterogeneous mixture of Cuban stock, and to carry out the extended views of British philanthropy, or policy, as it may be."—Union, of February last.

"BOSTON, January 29, 1858.—A letter received from Captain Ryan, of the ship Lion, from Hong Kong for Callao, dated Angier, November 22, states that the ship Kate Hooper, of Baltimore, Captain Jackson, from Macao, October 15, for Havana, with Coolies, was at Angier, November 22, waiting for men from Batavia. The Coolies mutinied and got possession of the between decks, and set the ship on fire three times, and before they could be subdued the officers had to shoot fifty of them."

"CHINESE COOLIES.—The Chinese emigrants are arriving at Havana in great numbers. No less than three thousand were landed from four ships in one week. They all readily brought twenty-two ounces a head. The most of them arrived in poor condition, which is probably owing to the Coolies being kept in dirty junks in Swatara, waiting for a vessel to bring them. At last accounts, six large American vessels were waiting for cargoes in Swatara alone. Orders have been sent from Havana to procure twenty thousand Coolies, if possible."—March 31.

Some details, as given in the following statement from an English paper, may be interesting:

"THE TRADE IN CHINESE COOLIES.—The frightful mortality of Chinese on board the British ship Duke of Portland has been the subject of investigation for several days, before the Local Marine Board, Cornhill, London; Mr. Duncan Dunbar, chairman.

"Captain Seymour, the master of the Duke of Portland, deposed that the ship left Hong Kong with three hundred and thirty-two Chinese Coolies."

He says, in his statement, one third had been kidnapped.

"About two o'clock on the 2d I left the shore with my papers all in order, and proceeded on board the Julindur to get a box of musket caps, which I was rather short of. I saw the mate masteading the topsails, and flattered myself all was right. Vain hope! I had not been on board five minutes when I saw the topsail halliards had been let go, and the Coolies crowding on the poop. I got on board in double quick time, and was followed by the captain and boats' crews from the three other ships with whom I was acquainted, and the scene of riot and confusion that awaited my arrival I shall not soon forget. The Coolies had taken the opportunity of the mate's attention being occupied in making sail, and abstracted the iron belaying pins, and armed themselves with what else they could on deck, principally firewood, and gained possession of the poop, and were yelling and shouting in a fearful manner, throwing everything moveable overboard, and had let go the topsail halliards."

This mutiny was quelled by force, and they were guarded and confined:

"The third day I had the first suicide, and from that date until I passed the Straits of Sunda, I had an average of about three overboard daily. They now also commenced threatening to burn the ship, and my interpreter becoming alarmed, I could not find the ringleaders. On the morning of the 15th, I discovered a plan they had laid to take the ship. One more of the invalids was to be thrown overboard, and during the absence of the boat to pick them up, the Coolies were to make a rush, obtain possession of the poop, and murder all hands, reserving the boat's crew to take the ship on shore; and the same afternoon they carried their plan out; but, as I was quite prepared for them, after the failure of their attempt they became much quieter; but I had on an average from twelve to eighteen in irons for riotous behavior and attempted suicide.

"But I could fill a volume on this subject and the horrors by which I was surrounded. We lost one hundred and twenty-eight Chinese before arriving at the Havana, chiefly from congestive fever; it is like the Hong Kong fever. We lost one of the crew. I think the Coolies brought the seeds of the disease on board with them. When they would not eat I have tried to force food down their throats. We were one hundred and fifty days on our passage from China to the Havana."

"At the close of the examination of the witnesses, the chairman announced the decision of the board: 'That no blame attaches to the owner and master, or any one connected with the ship. That Captain Seymour's conduct to the emigrants appears to have been kind and attentive, and that every possible precaution was used by him to decrease the mortality.'"

Sir, if these results follow where the Coolies are treated kindly and judiciously on board ship, what are you to expect when they are ill-treated? Let us, however, see how they are treated when landed in Peru. From a publication on the subject of agriculture, guano, &c., by H. N. Fryatt, of New Jersey, I read an extract:

"Now do you wish to know how all these ships are loaded, and a thousand tons per day dug and sent from the islands? Well, there are about one hundred convicts from Peru, and about three hundred Chinamen from the Celestial Empire. The former are in the right place; the latter were passengers that engaged passage in an English ship for California, and engaged before they left their own country, to labor after their arrival for a limited time to pay their passage, (eighty dollars.) Instead of being landed at California, the ship brought them direct to this place, and the captain sold them for three and six years, according to the men, to work out their passage; and here they are slaves for life. They are allowed four dollars per month for their food, and one-eighth of a dollar per day for their labor, with a pile of guano before them which will last the next ten years; and long before it is exhausted the majority of them will be dead. Each man is compelled to bring to the shore five tons of guano per day. A failure thereof is rewarded with the lash from a strong negro; and such is their horror of the lash, and the hopelessness of their condition, that every week there are more or less suicides. In the month of November, I have heard, fifty of the boldest of them joined hands and jumped from the precipice into the sea. In December, there were twenty-three suicides. This is from one in authority. In January, quite a number, but I have not learned how many."

Now, there are hundreds of these facts constantly published, or made known, and they do not excite any attention in this country; when, if it was known that ten negroes had committed suicide in one of our slave States, it would be published, perhaps, in every newspaper in the United States; and we should have many speeches on this floor, and elsewhere, against the horrors of slavery, &c. But these are only white men, who die under that system by thousands; and no Abolitionist, or other special friend of humanity, realizes it, or takes the slightest notice of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the honorable gentleman whether he intends bringing in a bill to suppress this Coolie trade?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will come to that point in a moment. In this matter I hope that I shall have the coöperation of the gentleman from Maine.

I also read a portion of a letter from the author of this work:

"The officers placed on these islands to superintend the delivery of the guano, in order to check this business of self-destruction, adopted the plan of rescuing the dead bodies from the sea and burning them on the guano heaps, in order to convince the Chinese of the impossibility of their return to their native country, through the gates of death; that the bodies should remain on the island. I was informed that this burning of bodies was of frequent occurrence."

"I have recently conversed with intelligent captains engaged in the Cuban trade, who tell me how the Coolie trade is done. English commercial houses have runners at Amoy, Hong Kong, &c., who are employed in enticing the Chinamen, by offers of wages, &c., to emigrate to the land of gold. They pick up the population who live outside the walled towns, the short-haired, and a sprinkling of a better class, who are distinguished by the long braided hair hanging behind, and somewhat superior intelligence. All manner of inducements are held out, of course. These Coolies are furnished with rice and water for food during the passage; are treated with much severity, and frequent suicides occur during the passage. Guards are placed over them to prevent their jumping overboard, &c.; and yet, notwithstanding these precautions, about one in three either die or destroy themselves on the passage."

"The passage is five doubloons, landed in Havana, (eighty-five dollars.) They are sold at Havana according to quality; and the most valuable bring as high as three hundred to three hundred and fifty dollars apiece."

"The trade is done chiefly by English and American vessels; but my informants say that they never knew an American captain to bring a cargo of Coolies twice. The English are not so scrupulous."

"The Coolies are put to work alongside of the Africans, and subjected to worse treatment, as the Coolie feels his degradation and becomes sullen and melancholy. His only relief is in the old mode, suicide, which he avails himself of at the first opportunity. The long-haired Chinaman cuts his tail off as a mark of his degradation; and as soon as the driver sees his tail go he knows that the owner intends to depart to that bourn, &c., pretty quickly; and not alone, either, as the long tail exercises much influence over the others.

This trade being so lucrative, it is on the increase. The high price of sugar will likely add a stimulus to this new species of slave trade, which I, for one, feel much indebted to you for holding up to the execration of mankind."

I have, in addition to that, a letter from a respectable merchant of the city of New York, a gentleman of high standing. I do not give his name, but the following is a part of his letter:

"Our eastern ship owners have great horror of the African slave trade, but they have no compunctions of conscience in abducting Coolies from China and transporting them to South America. To save appearances, they land them at Africa, in Peru, whence they are transferred to the Chincha Islands, where they are worked digging guano under a broiling sun until they are driven to desperation. I had a ship, the St. Patrick, load at those islands. My captain, Whitman, said that, whenever the poor creatures could get to the cliffs, they would jump into the sea. Some twenty jumped off whilst he was there. You are not, perhaps, aware that there is no water on the islands. All the water used is taken there by the ships; and, of course, being so scarce, the poor creatures have but a limited quantity given them. And the dust arising from the guano, with the severe labor they undergo, drives them to desperation. Water must be wanted in large quantities. Your negroes at the South are in Paradise compared with the Coolies at the Chincha Islands."

Mr. Speaker, I need not enlarge on the cruelty of this system. And it does not stop here. France imported Coolies into some of her islands. In the Island of Bourbon alone, there are thirty-five thousand. But England seems, in some way, to have interposed obstacles to the obtaining of Coolies by the French, wishing to have a monopoly of the business, perhaps, as she formerly had of the African slave trade.

To get rid of that difficulty, the French Emperor directed his ships to go to Africa and get negroes under the name of apprentices. The English protested against that, and said it was practically reopening the slave trade. The Times thundered about it. It was admitted, nevertheless, that the Abolitionists had ruined their West India Islands, and that they ought to acknowledge their fault in sackcloth and ashes; but it proposed only to restore these islands by the importation of Coolie labor. To show how the controversy is carried on, I present a few passages from the French papers. I think it will be seen that they understand the question thoroughly; and, in fact, have the advantage in the argument.

"But Africa continues to be the source whence the colonies first drew their laboring population. It is convenient to our American possessions. Its inhabitants are gentle, robust, sociable, and inclined to agricultural pursuits. Then, in addition to this, they are oppressed and subject to the horrors of perpetual anarchy in their own country.

"Are not these reasons sufficient to induce us to look to Africa for laborers for our colonies?"

"But it is a great scandal to the superannuated society which was accustomed for twenty-five years to behold the world bow before its decrees in matters of philanthropy. What! lay hands on Africa, the holy ark which has been guarded with such an extreme jealousy, and defended still more by the prestige which it has acquired? Yet the Times thinks the present opportunity fortunate for seizing it again; and, thanks to its proceedings, Parliament already resounds with the declaration of grievances, the most grievous of which is that they cannot have laborers from Africa except they purchase them again. It is a natural result of the social state of that country. Slavery is the general condition of its working population.

"But, say the English, when you buy slaves from the African chiefs you encourage those chiefs to procure others by means of incursions, and thus perpetuate intestine wars in that unhappy country. Unfortunately, the barbarism which reigns in that continent is exercised independently of all outside pressure. When an African chief does not sell his slaves, he kills them.

"To deprive Africa of contact with civilization, under the pretext of preserving peace among her tribes, is to act like a quack, who, to cure an eruption, kills his patient by the internal concentration of the disease. The African chiefs have no motive for making war; they do so out of a pure instinct of destructiveness, and by this alone they prove themselves savages. The poor negro captives destined for human sacrifice on the occasion of some public festival, or on the tomb of a warrior, would hardly call it philanthropy to leave them to their fate under pretext of a humane objection to their purchase for emigration.

"Bible Societies have undertaken to submit Africa to a régime of preaching, distribution of edifying tracts and 'saintly communion.'"

"In any case, we cannot see why the ultra Abolitionists should impose their particular views upon us. Is not Africa an independent country? Is it confined to the tutelage of Bible Societies? And France—cannot she act according to the dictates of her own conscience? There exists in this respect no international engagement that can limit her action. The conventions relative to the right of search have been suppressed. Engagements entered into since then have been abandoned.

"The landed proprietor is then rid of every incumbrance. Following the Times, the philanthropists have made some stupid blunders, which should force them into private life, or at least teach them to speak with becoming modesty in future. In this situation of things, when it has been proved that the system has utterly failed, is it astonishing that we should try another? This would at least have two good results. It would give new activity to colonial productions, and withdraw thousands of negroes from a miserable condition."

I must say that I agree with the French, that all the points of difference are in their favor. The negro is not only better fitted by nature for slavery than the Chinese or Sepoys, but in fact is benefited by it, while they are driven to suicide. The negroes, too, are slaves at home, or captives to be put to death if they cannot be sold, while the Chinamen and East Indians are in a comparative state of freedom.

Here is a letter on the subject from Mr. Mason, our Minister at Paris, dated 19th February last, which was sent to the Senate the other day by General Cass. It is of an important character:

"In an interview which I had the honor to have with Count Walewski, Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the last week of January, I asked him if there were any objections to my being informed of the precise character of the measures adopted by his Majesty the Emperor's Government, in regard to the importation into the French colonies of negroes from Africa. He replied that there was not; and proceeded to state very frankly that the French colonies, particularly in the West Indies, were languishing for want of labor; that negro labor alone was adapted to tropical productions. I asked if there was any truth in some statements which I had seen in the English newspapers, that French vessels freighted with African emigrants would be regarded by British cruisers as engaged in the African slave trade. His Excellency said no; that there had been some communication between the two Governments, and the British Government would not object to the French scheme, while the wants of the British colonies were being supplied by the Coolie trade. The Minister urged that the plan adopted secured African labor, which was indispensable to their colonies. Thus the emigrants were free, and were rescued generally from impending immolation; that, relieved from ignorance and heathenism of the most degrading character, they would be humanized and Christianized by being placed in contact with the French colonists."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it is settled between the two countries that this system is to go on, France taking negroes and Great Britain the Asiatics. What is the field they have to take them from, and what is the extent to which the operation can be carried? In China there are four hundred million people. Great Britain is now conquering parts of the country, and will have free access to the people of the Chinese Empire. She also holds in subjection one hundred and seventy million East Indians, whom she is killing for mutiny, &c. There are at least forty million negroes on the western coast of Africa within the reach of the slave traders. You will see, therefore, that one half of the human race is open to be preyed upon in this way.

Now what is the inducement to carry on the trade? It appears that they will bring from two to four hundred dollars apiece, and the cost of transporting them from China is only eighty or eighty-five dollars, and from Africa about half that; so you will see that there is inducement enough. Here are enormous profits to be made. How many will they transport when this system is in full operation? We know that there have been half a million of emigrants brought in one year to the United States, by American ships mainly. I take it, then, that the navies of France and England, with the help of American shipping, will enable them to bring over, perhaps, a million a year—certainly half that amount. You will then, perhaps, see a vast system of emigration by which all these islands and Central America may be filled up, if not interrupted in some way, with this people. And, as they only bring males, I need not say to gentlemen that the system is more cruel than the former slave trade. Then males and females were brought here, and there was something of a social system recognized in that trade. Then these people are to be hired out; and nobody will deny that they will be worse treated than the slaves usually are who belong to those that control them. I maintain that this system is one of enormous cruelty, as every one must see at a glance. Its subjects will, most probably, be worked to death by the time their eight or ten years' service is over.

Mr. Speaker, we have upon the coast of Africa ships to aid Great Britain in the suppression of the slave trade; and yet she is transporting men who are free comparatively, and vastly superior to the negro, and consigning them in vast numbers to the most cruel condition of slavery ever known. I submit whether it is not a mockery, whether it is not hypocritical in the United States and Great Britain to try to save a few negroes while this enormous system is going on. I say that it is as hypocritical as it would be for an individual, who had been robbing the poor of thousands systematically, to give away a few shillings ostentatiously on Sunday for charitable purposes. As we have this agreement with Great Britain, why not speak out our sentiments manfully, and tell her that, if she does not abandon this, we will withdraw our squadron from Africa, and no longer attempt to prevent the carrying away of a few negroes to Cuba, while countless numbers of white men are being enslaved?

The great objection to our acquiring Mexico as a whole, is to be found in the fact of the existence there of a large population of Indians and other inferior persons. Suppose Louisiana, Florida, or Texas, had been filled up with a large number of inferior people, which we could not reduce to subjection: that fact would have rendered them useless to the United States. On the principles of humanity, in the first place, and secondly, upon the question of expediency also, I am against this system of filling up these now thinly inhabited neighboring regions with inferior and degraded races. Gentlemen must see that it is the ultimate policy of the United States, at some future day, whether ten, twenty, or fifty years hence, to acquire the greater portion of this territory. I hold, sir, that our system will be better for that country than the system of Great Britain; and that, therefore, it will be for the interest of all that region, as it unquestionably will be our policy some day to control it.

Gentlemen may say, however, suppose that the treaty is abrogated, and England refuses to yield: will you go to war with her? That is thrown at us by way of intimidation. I have observed the course of the British Government, and they have two systems of operation against us. They may be defined as what Sammy Weller would call "insinuation and bluster." Many of our statesmen are so delighted to get compliments from the British press, and to be thought well of by British officials, that they seem to forget the interest of their own country. I remember, a few years ago, when there was an investigation going on in the British Parliament, in relation to the expenses of their missions abroad, that Mr. Packenham, who had long been a minister here, was a witness, and he was asked what expenditure paid best? His reply was, "that spent for dinners." Whether his American experience brought him to that conclusion or not, I do not know. I confess that I appreciate a dinner and civility as much as anybody; but it is one thing to accept and return courtesies, and it is another to abandon the interests of one's country.

I have no doubt that every right-minded Englishman will think better of American statesmen who, while accepting the civilities of foreigners, will still stand by the interests of their country rather than sell it for a mess of pottage. When these means fail, we are to be alarmed by threats of danger from England, and sometimes with great effect on the timid. I doubt much whether any Administration we have had since John Tyler's would have had the courage to accept Texas upon her application, in the face of the British protest against it. I am very certain that some of them would have professed to be afraid, and would have declined it. I think it absolutely necessary that this country should, in some respects, take a higher position abroad. An extremely mortifying fact was brought to my knowledge the other day. A bearer of dispatches came here from St. Domingo. He called to see me, thinking that Congress might be induced to do something. He says that the American commercial agent at the city of St. Domingo, with his family, and all American citizens in that country, are actually protected from massacre by Bacoz and his followers, by the British consul, and by the captain of an English ship who happened to be there, and who was ready to land four hundred men to protect them. I knew that in Europe, Asia, and Africa, our citizens were in the habit of claiming to be Englishmen, in order to get British protection; but I did not know that this system had to be resorted to in America, and almost in sight of our own shores.

Is it not time that something should be done. There has been great difficulty upon the part of the Secretary of the Navy in finding a ship to send there to protect our citizens. I think that the African squadron might as well be employed upon that service. If we will submit to indignities from white men, it is rather too much to take insults and kicks from free negroes. Cannot the Greytown affair at least be repeated in St. Domingo?

But we are constantly met with the allegation that Congress will do nothing; that Congress would not back the Executive. We know very well the short-comings of Congress; but, in my judgment, there have been but few instances where the Executive has had occasion to call for and has shown a disposition to use force, that Congress did not properly respond. Not only in the Maine boundary dispute, but during the Mexican war, the Government had everything it asked. The misfortune has been, that some of our Presidents heretofore have not shown the purpose to act, and the consequence has been, that Congress has been slow in advancing anything. Our Navy now costs $15,000,000 a year—more than the whole General Government cost in the year 1824—and yet I am told that the Navy is not much more efficient than it was in 1816. This, if true, is attributable to the miserable system which now prevails in having ignorant clerks in the Departments at the heads of bureaus, to whom the management of the Department is committed, while the Secretary himself sometimes, not being familiar with the business, trusts it to his subordinates. I hope we shall have a reform in this respect.

As far as concerns the present Administration, it has not, as yet, had an opportunity of showing its hand upon our foreign policy. It has been occupied with certain domestic questions; but, I think, from the antecedents of the President and the Secretary of State, we have a right to expect a more determined policy. I read last session an extract from Mr. Buchanan's Ostend manifesto. The language is so good that I desire to repeat it again. On the 18th of October he says:

"Under such circumstances, we ought neither to count the cost nor regard the odds which Spain might enlist against us. We forbear to enter into the question, whether the present condition of the island would justify such a measure? We should, however, be recreant to our duty, be unworthy of our gallant forefathers, and commit base treason against our posterity, should we permit Cuba to be Africanized, and become a second St. Domingo, with all its attendant horrors to the white race, and suffer the flames to extend to our own neighboring shores, seriously to endanger, or actually to consume, the fair fabric of our Union."

These are bold and striking words.

What are the views of our Secretary of State—the learned, accomplished veteran, Cass? Gentlemen will remember that in 1848, when he was before the country as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, he took ground in favor of the occupation of Yucatan by the United States troops; and only two years ago, in a letter to New York, he uses this language:

"I am free to confess that the heroic effort of our countrymen in Nicaragua excites my admiration, while it engages all my solicitude. I am not to be deterred from the expression of these feelings by sneers, or reproaches, or hard words. He who does not sympathize with such an enterprise has little in common with me."

"The difficulties which General Walker has encountered and overcome will place his name high on the roll of the distinguished men of his age. He has conciliated the people he went to aid; the government of which he makes part is performing its functions without opposition, and internal tranquillity marks the wisdom of its policy. That magnificent region, for which God has done so much and man so little, needed some renovating process, some transference by which new life may be imparted to it. Our countrymen will plant there the seeds of our institutions, and God grant that they may grow up into an abundant harvest of industry, enterprise, and prosperity! A new day, I hope, is opening upon the States of Central America. If we are true to our duty, they will soon be freed from all danger of European interference, and will have a security in their own power against the ambitious designs of England far better than Clayton-Bulwer treaties or any other diplomatic machinery by which a spirit of aggression is sought to be concealed till circumstances are ready for active operation."

Such are the views of General Cass. Now, sir, I propose to this House simply to respond to the views of the President's message, by indorsing them, condemning this Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and leaving him to take the necessary steps to rid us of it. I have no fear of any war arising out of the subject. Great Britain has vast pecuniary and commercial interests involved in her relations with the United States, and it also would be very difficult for her to defend Canada and her other possessions against us. She is not rashly going to war with us. At this very time she is engaged in a Chinese war, and an East Indian war, and is, in addition to that, threatened with European difficulties. She, therefore, has no motive to seek war with us. The present English Cabinet is believed to be favorable to a liberal settlement of this question. Let us go forward and get it settled now. It is not, at this time, of much practical importance, and, therefore, it may be the more readily adjusted. If it is not done, in the future, when a practical question shall arise in relation to it, it may involve us in war.

Mr. BLISS. I have listened with a great deal of attention, but do not understand what the object of this movement is. Do I understand the gentleman as advocating a policy leading to the seizure of Cuba and Central America?

Mr. CLINGMAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLISS. What, then, is the idea?

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is to abrogate this treaty.

Mr. BLISS. But all the gentleman's argument is directed to explaining our standing and position in respect to Cuba and Central America; and, as I understand it, no sooner is the Kansas question disposed of, than this Cuba and Central America question is raised, for the extension of slavery.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I cannot answer for the gentleman's understanding. This may not be a matter of very great practical importance now; but it is my judgment that, ten, twenty, or fifty years hence, it may be our policy to acquire those territories, and I desire to remove obstructions now.

As I said before, suppose, when Great Britain protested against the annexation of Texas, a treaty had been enforced binding us not to acquire it: its annexation would, in that event, have led to war. The infraction of a positive agreement with her, in addition to an act to which she was hostile, must necessarily have led to war. We had no obligations in the way, and no rupture resulted. I desire to remove all offensive alliances which shall stand in our way hereafter.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he is to be understood as advocating the annexation of Cuba, or whether he discards that idea?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure, though I do not desire to embark in the discussion of that subject. I will say that I should be very glad to see Cuba annexed to this country. I would have been glad to get it upon fair and honorable terms four years ago, and I think the country ought to have taken it upon the happening of the Black Warrior affair. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty does not touch Cuba. We could get Cuba without abrogating this treaty. I care nothing in the world about it so far as Cuba is concerned. I should like to see Cuba a part of this Union. Its annexation would also stop the African slave trade and this more objectionable traffic in Chinese and East Indians who are carried there and destroyed. Would not the gentleman like to see an annexation of Cuba by which the slave trade and the Coolie trade would be stopped?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not rise to embarrass my friend. I would ask him this question: is he in favor of the acquisition of Cuba now?

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will point me to any honorable mode by which we can get Cuba, I will give that mode my support this very moment. If the Executive can make a treaty with Spain for Cuba, I would favor that project, provided the equivalent were not unreasonable. Some time ago I offered a resolution calling for information on Spanish affairs, but I understand that it is inexpedient to furnish that information up to this time. If our difficulties with Spain are not settled, I am willing, in the ultimate stage, to go to war with her, and then, if we can conquer Cuba, I will not complain of that result.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I understand the gentleman to refer to the Ostend circular.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does the gentleman approve of the terms of that document?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIDDINGS. That will answer my purpose.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think I go quite as far as Old Buck does in this line. I have, Mr. Speaker, nearly used up the time which, by the courtesy of the House, has been given to me, and I must bring my remarks to a conclusion. All I desire is for the House fairly to indorse the position assumed by the President.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Let me ask my friend to explain one point. His resolution speaks of abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Does he contemplate that the President, by his own authority, shall do that, or that negotiations shall go on to that effect?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The President has said, in his message, that it ought to have been abrogated long ago by consent of both parties. I have good reason to believe—I wish I could state all the reasons for my belief—that the British Cabinet are tired of the negotiations which have been going on for eight years upon this subject, and that they are now ready to adjust the question on honorable terms; and I have no doubt that the Executive, by proper effort, will be enabled to do it at this time. I do not know that it could be done twelve months hence, or at a later day. But, by its abrogation, every gentleman will see that we will get rid of the shackles that now clog us, and be left as free from entangling alliances with European Powers as we had been from the days of General Washington down to the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Does my friend mean to intimate that Great Britain is willing to give up Roatan?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will answer with pleasure. Great Britain, by the Dallas treaty, agreed to give up Roatan to Honduras, provided there was a guarantee that slavery should never go there. The United States would make no such guarantee, and that treaty was rejected. I have no doubt, however, that Great Britain will, in view of her treaty with Honduras, agree to abandon her claims in that quarter, and also withdraw, on reasonable terms, her Mosquito protectorate. The feeling of the American people is against this Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Its current is setting so strong in that direction that no one can expect to change it. Let the Government, then, do its duty, and we are again free, and the path of destiny is open before us.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RITCHIE obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. CLINGMAN, who said: With the permission of my friend from Pennsylvania, I will suggest that he move, or allow me to move, that this matter be recommitted in order that it may be kept before the House.

Mr. RITCHIE. My understanding of this question was, that it was to come up as the regular business in order at one o'clock to-day.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House was revoked by unanimous consent.

Mr. RITCHIE. Will this question come up to-morrow if I submit a motion to recommmit?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. RITCHIE. Then I submit that motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles, in which he had been directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 218) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the price therefor, and for other purposes, approved August 26, 1852;" and

An act (S. No. 300) for the relief of the Hungarian settlers on certain tracts of land in Iowa hitherto reserved from sale by order of the President, dated January 22, 1853.

PRINTING BILL.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. With the consent of the House, I will move that that printing bill which has just come from the Senate be referred to the special committee on the subject of printing; and that it be ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move that that bill be referred to the regular standing Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I only ask that the question shall be taken on printing the bill, in order that members may have it before them.

It was so ordered.

BLYTHE ISLAND NAVY DEPOT.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask to have entered upon the Journal, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Blythe Island Navy depot bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he did, on this day, approve and sign bills of the following titles:

An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1859; and

An act for the relief of Captain James Mac McIntosh, of the United States Navy.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER stated the first question in order to be on the bill of the Senate (No. 86) for the admission of Minnesota into the Union, upon which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is not my design to make any extended argument upon the question before the House. I merely wish to assign very briefly the reasons why I cannot vote for the admission of Minnesota. Reasons were assigned yesterday, many of which I think ought to be decisive. The argument of my friend from Virginia, from the Accomac district, [Mr. GARNETT,] would decide my judgment. The reason that I, however, more especially rest my opposition to it upon, is one which was not urged yesterday at all. It was referred to in passing by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who, however, did not go to the extent to which I think he might have gone, and perhaps ought to have gone. I allude to the suffrage clause of the constitution—to that portion of it which is as follows: "White persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization;" who, of course, have not actually become citizens of the United States.

The only question that I desire to present to the House is, whether the State of Minnesota has a right, under the constitution of the United States, to confer the privilege of suffrage on that class of persons. If she have that right under the constitution, then, whether wise or unwise, it is none of my business. If she have not the right to confer it upon this class of persons, then, in doing so, she is directly affecting my rights under the Constitution of the United States; and that Constitution, in referring the question of the admission of a State to this House, requires me in voting to express an opinion upon it.

That the right of suffrage, under the constitution of a State, does directly affect all the States of the Union, is apparent, with very little explanation. The qualification for electors of Representatives in this Hall is made the same with the qualification of voters for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. When, therefore, she defines the qualification of voters for her Legislature, she defines likewise the persons who shall elect her Representatives, who, here in the Congress of the United States, pass laws which are to govern Maryland. These same electors elect the Legislature of the State which elects the Senators of the United States, who participate in the treaty-making power, and the power of approving of his appointments, as well as in matters of legislation. Therefore it is that for the State of Minnesota to confer upon unnaturalized foreigners the power to vote for the most numerous branch of her State Legislature, is to confer upon them, not merely power to govern the State of Minnesota, or to misgovern it, but it confers on them power to govern me and my constituents. It gives the unnaturalized foreigner, who may be an alien enemy at the moment of casting the vote, power to determine questions of peace and war; power to determine questions relating to treaties with foreign Powers; power to determine every question that may be referred to this House or to the Senate for their determination. If she have the right, under the Constitution, to govern my constituents by alien votes, then, whether it be wise or unwise; whether it be neighborly or not; whether it be treating the other States of the Confederacy rightly or wrongly, is a subject upon which my mouth is sealed. If she have not the right, then it is my bounden duty here to express my opinion upon it, and to give that opinion the sanction of a vote; and it is that which I am prepared here this day to do.

Mr. Speaker, when the question of submitting the constitution of Michigan on the point of boundaries to the people was pending, Mr. Calhoun made an argument on this question; and he there expressed the opinion that no State had the right to confer on unnaturalized foreigners a right to vote. He deduced that from his idea that the right to vote is an incident connected with the right of citizenship, not that all citizens were entitled to vote, but that none but citizens could be entitled to vote. His argument was in the nature of a reductio ad absurdum. He argued it at length. He did not trace it up to that clause of the Constitution which to my judgment is decisive upon the point, but his arguments showing the difficulties that were involved in an opposite hypothesis were, in the absence of any other clause of the Constitution than that touching naturalization, enough to show that it could not be a constitutional right. I shall not presume to weaken that argument by attempting to repeat it. I merely mean to add a reference to a clause of the Constitution of the United States which, in my judgment, is decisive.

The first words of the Constitution are familiar to everybody: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," &c., "ordain the following Constitution." In point of law, I supposed there had been no doubt as to the meaning of the words "people of the United States," so far as this question is concerned. It is plain that at that day the word people was regarded as meaning any one, the political people of the United States. It did not refer to foreigners residing in our midst. It did not refer to mere transitory residents any more than it referred to slaves in the southern States. It referred to persons who had a voice in determining that constitution, who constituted the body-politic as contradistinguished from the inhabitants of the United States. And that such was the opinion prevailing at that day is apparent by that other clause which provides the rule of direct taxation, which is to be determined by the numbers of persons.

Let us read the words defining the body of people who are to elect this House: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year." Chosen by whom? Not by the inhabitants of the various States, but chosen by the people of the several States. The only question, then, is, what does the word "people," in that connection, mean? Does it mean all persons incidentally within the limits of the State? Does it mean merely the residents of the States? If it mean that, then it will go to the extent of allowing a slave to be one of the people of a State for the purpose of voting; and that is the reductio ad absurdum of the objection. It would go not merely to the extent of allowing the unnaturalized foreigner who had declared his intention of becoming a citizen, but it would allow any person, merely there for a day, to be one of the people of the State. New York could import her voters from Canada in the morning and carry them back in the evening. I submit that the word "people" there must have the same meaning which it has above in the phrase "people of the United States," as used in the first clause of the preamble of the Constitution of the United States. It refers, unquestionably, to the body-politic. And under these words every person is excluded who is not, in the meaning of that clause, a member of the body-politic.

What is the meaning of the words, "people of the United States?" I suppose that it includes only persons who are citizens of the United States. I think that there will be no controversy in this House that that is the only legal meaning of the words. That opinion has been expressed in language as explicit as any I can use, and greatly more authoritatively, by the Chief Justice of the United States. That clause has been construed as definitely as any clause has ever been construed.

And without prolonging the argument upon this point, I will merely read the language of the Chief Justice. I may be permitted to say that I do not regard the decision of the Supreme Court as binding upon this House on any political question. This House is undoubtedly the ultimate tribunal upon such questions. Our judgment is subject to no review by any tribunal. Yet, sir, this has been made, to some extent, a judicial question, and one which has passed under review by the highest judicial tribunal of the United States; and I will accord to that tribunal very great weight in guiding my own judgment; and it is in that view I shall close what I have said on this subject by reading the words of the Chief Justice to which I have referred:

"The words, 'people of the United States' and 'citizens,' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call 'the sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of this people and a constituent member of this sovereignty."

Now, I suppose it will be conceded by gentlemen on all sides of the House, that if the constitution had provided that the qualification of electors for Representatives in this House shall be that they shall be citizens of the United States, that clause in the constitution of Minnesota would not be in strict conformity with the Constitution of the United States. But that not having been done in words, the question arises whether they are not as much restricted by the Constitution as if it had said, in so many words, "citizens of the United States," instead of "people of the United States," or "people of the several States?"

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Maryland understands the opinion of the Chief Justice to be that a State cannot permit unnaturalized foreigners to vote for members of Congress and State Legislature?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, if my honorable friend from Virginia will permit me, I must object to be drawn from the point I am discussing. I think that the point he has raised is not involved in anything I have said, and does not touch exactly the point I am urging.

Mr. JENKINS. My friend will allow me to say one sentence; and that is, that the opinions of the Supreme Court have been given directly in the opposite direction.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Neither the Supreme Court of the United States nor the Chief Justice has decided any such question; but I must decline very respectfully to argue the question at this time. I quoted that decision merely for the meaning which the Chief Justice, in accordance with the opinion which I have long entertained myself, assigned to the words, "people of the United States," and the "people of the several States," in the clause to which I have referred. Thus that clause in relation to electors would leave the power in the State, if it is understood in that way: that the State has the right to prescribe the qualifications of electors to the most numerous branch of the State Legislature exactly as it prescribes the qualifications of all electors under the State constitution; but that that right can only be in conformity with any limitation which the Constitution of the United States may have imposed upon the States. It only involves the ordinary idea that so far as the Constitution of the United States does undertake to determine anything, it is conclusive over the State as well as over the individual. And the only question open here is whether this is the meaning of the clause of the Constitution of the United States. That, sir, is a question which directly pertains to us here.

Mr. JENKINS. I ask the gentleman simply to let me read two paragraphs from that decision, and let them be printed in his speech.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman will pardon me if I decline at present to have the Dred Scott decision, and its general correctness or incorrectness, made a part of this controversy. It has nothing to do with it. I merely refer to the construction of those words by a great judicial mind, to show how it regarded these words. There I rest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this question is one which addresses itself directly to us. We are authorized by the Constitution of the United States to judge of the election and qualifications of our own members. Congress is authorized to regulate the time, place, and manner of electing the members of this House. In judging, therefore, of the election of a member of this House, it is very possible the question may arise. The question has not yet directly arisen. It might have arisen in the case of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. It is possible that we may be called on to decide whether an unnaturalized voter under a State constitution is a legal voter. Ohio does not allow unnaturalized foreigners to vote; there are States which do allow it; and the question may arise in that way. That question, therefore, is one which may be brought directly before us for our decision; and, if I am correct in the construction which I have given to the clause of the Constitution in question, whenever that question arises, and the balance shall be turned, between two contesting members, by unnaturalized votes being cast for one, we are bound to decide whether the Constitution of the United States is paramount to State constitutions; and whether, if it be so paramount, the meaning of that clause is the one I have assigned to it; because, if an unnaturalized voter be not one of the people of the State within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, then, as the Constitution of the United States says that Representatives shall be elected by the people of the State, the unnaturalized foreigner cannot cast his vote as one of the people of the State; and the person here claiming a seat by virtue of a majority made up of such votes, cannot have his seat.

So far as I am concerned, I am free now to say that, whenever that question shall be presented to me as a judicial question, I am ready to vote upon it irrespective of party considerations, and I shall vote against the gentleman who here claims his seat by the votes of unnaturalized foreigners.

You will perceive, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the purport of my argument is to show that while the qualifications of electors for this House must be the same with those for the lower branch of the State Legislature; yet, since the people of the State alone are to elect, that carries with it an inhibition on the State itself to make any one an elector for the lower branch of the Legislature who is not one of the political people of the State. That is all I have to say on this question.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not expect, Mr. Speaker, to enter into this debate with regard to the constitution of Minnesota, nor do I now propose to say anything on the general subject.

The gentleman from Maryland has just concluded an argument somewhat ingeniously arranged, by which we are to understand it is his conviction that the Federal Government has the right to declare who shall be electors in a State. Although he does not assume the proposition boldly, I understand that to be the effect of his argument, and it is against that I desire to enter my protest. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] yesterday, in making the opening speech on this subject, asserted the same proposition substantially.

In looking at the debates on the formation of the Federal Constitution, I think it will be ascertained that that question, as to who should regulate the right of suffrage, was one that gave the convention very considerable trouble. It was determined that, from the difficulties which would attend an effort on the part of the Federal Government to determine who shall be electors in the several States, the fixing of the qualifications of the electors should be left in the States respectively for their own control.

I concur with that gentleman, and with others who have spoken on the subject, that if I were discussing a bill to authorize the organization of a territorial government, I would limit the right of suffrage in the Territory to citizens of the United States. That far Congress has a right to go, and that far a sense of expediency and right will induce me to go.

But, sir, we are not now discussing what Congress might do in determining the elective franchise in a Territory for territorial purposes. We are now discussing the provisions of the constitution of Minnesota. It is true, Minnesota is not yet a State; but it is also true, that in our action upon this constitution we have to act upon it as if it were a State. If, then, we undertake to say that the provision of the constitution recognizing the right of unnaturalized foreigners to vote is violative of the Constitution of the United States, we assert the power of Congress to determine in whom the elective franchise shall rest in the several States. We can, with the same propriety, and with the same justice, and upon the same principle, if that proposition be true, say to the State of Pennsylvania, or to the State of Virginia, that no unnaturalized person in either of those States shall be an elector. There seems to be a strange confounding of the power of Congress to authorize the naturalization of foreigners with the right of the States to determine who are qualified electors under their laws and constitutions. While the right has been reserved to Congress to pass a general naturalization law, no power has been reserved to Congress to declare who shall be the electors of a State. And I take it to be true and undeniable, that any State of this Union may authorize women to vote if it sees proper, or that minors may vote if it thinks proper, or it may authorize slaves—though the gentleman from Maryland doubts it—to vote. There is no power in Congress to revise the action of a State where it would not affect the right of representation upon this floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether he thinks that, under the Constitution of the United States, either an individual State or the people of a Territory, in framing a constitution, would have the right to confer the right of suffrage upon an alien enemy?

Mr. REAGAN. I will not undertake to answer that question now. It is not pertinent to the question before us. I may say this, however: that by the law of nations—a law which would be recognized in acting upon any State question—we cannot do so, unless we are prepared to commit legal treason. I cannot see why the question was asked. It can have no relation to the domestic government of the country.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to dwell upon the legal arguments in reference to this question; but shall leave that to gentlemen who are better qualified to discuss questions of law. But, as gentlemen here, in making their remarks, directed many of their arguments against emigration, and against the naturalization of foreigners, I intend to confine my remarks generally to that particular branch of the subject. I perceive that much of the discussion yesterday was directed to that particular point, and hence I shall endeavor, as far as I possibly can, to remove the erroneous impressions which these remarks tended to make upon the House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. The rule requires that the debate shall be pertinent to the question before the House. If the gentleman desires to make a speech upon the benefits of emigration, I hope he will make it in Committee of the Whole. Such debate is not in order here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot determine as yet whether the gentleman will be in order or not. The general question of emigration will not be opened to debate upon this bill.

Mr. KELLY. What I shall say will be pertinent to the issue before the House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I insist on my question of order. I would inquire whether the subject of emigration, which is manifestly the question which the gentleman intends to discuss, is debatable on this bill? I do not wish to embarrass the gentleman, but desire, if he wants to debate that subject, that he shall do it in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman cannot indulge in the merits of the propositions incidentally discussed yesterday by the gentlemen from Kentucky and Tennessee, the pending question being the admission of Minnesota. Incidentally, the gentleman can discuss the question of naturalization, as other gentlemen have done; but the gentleman must confine himself to the merits of the pending question.

Mr. KELLY. Does the gentleman take exception to the remarks I have made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that a portion of the remarks the gentleman has submitted indicates a determination upon the part of the gentleman from New York to discuss that which the Chair thinks is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from New York will be permitted to deliver his speech. He is upon the floor now, and the matter of naturalization is involved more or less in the merits of the question before the House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. If unanimous consent be given, I am willing to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and allow the gentleman to speak, but I must object to it in the House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I submit that so much of the gentleman's remarks as refer to the subject of emigration of persons to that Territory are in order.

Mr. KELLY commenced the reading of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman cannot proceed unless by the unanimous consent of the House.

Many MEMBERS. No objection.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. With the understanding that I may have an opportunity to reply, I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. KELLY. It is singular that gentlemen should make objection, when it is a well known fact that the whole discussion on this bill has directed itself to that particular point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the questions of emigration and naturalization have only been incidentally referred to by gentlemen during the discussion. It would not be in order to take up those two questions and discuss them elaborately and fully upon a bill to admit Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I do not like to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but here, for instance, is a provision in the constitution of Minnesota which allows an unnaturalized alien to vote. What is the effect? Is that a stimulus to alien emigration? If it is, is not the policy of stimulating alien emigration directly a matter in issue under that clause?

The SPEAKER. But by the same process of reasoning, the gentleman from Kentucky could discuss the whole social relations of the Old World, wherever the emigration comes from.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I think the whole social arrangements of those countries is a proper subject of discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I would remark that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JENKINS] introduced this particular subject yesterday, and occupied twenty-five minutes in its discussion.

The SPEAKER. Whenever the gentleman from New York confines his remarks to that branch of the question, the Chair thinks it will be in order; but as to the merits of emigration, or the general merits of the naturalization laws, the Chair thinks that those subjects are hardly before the House.

Mr. KELLY. I dislike very much to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, particularly from the decision of the gentleman now occupying the chair; but as I intended to make my remarks on this subject, and as I cannot see any other opportunity to do so, I hope I will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. To enable the gentleman to do so in order, I shall move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Debate is closed on the bill pending before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Well, let us take up some bill on which debate is not concluded.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must object to that.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. KELLY. I withdraw my appeal; but I think there is a disposition on the part of the House to let me go on.

Several MEMBERS. There is; go ahead.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that unanimous consent is given to the gentleman's proceeding?

Mr. LOVEJOY. Not unless he is in order.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I object, because if the gentleman is allowed to proceed other gentlemen must be allowed to speak in reply, and thus we would have a general debate in violation of the rules of the House; and I will not agree to violating the rules of the House.

Mr. KELLY. Inasmuch as there are objections, I withdraw my appeal. I do not desire to force myself upon the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, having examined the constitution under which Minnesota asks to be admitted into the Union, as one of the States of this Confederacy, I desire briefly to call the attention of the House to certain provisions contained in that constitution, which are, in my opinion, in violation not only of the spirit, but the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

Article seven, section one, declares that—

"Every male person of the age of twenty-one years, or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and in this State four months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, in the election district of which he shall at the time have been for ten days a resident, for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people:

"First. White citizens of the United States.

"Second. White persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intentions to become citizens, conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization.

"Third. Persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted their customs and habits of civilization."

You perceive, Mr. Speaker, from this provision of the constitution, that men, who have not thrown off their allegiance to the foreign Government from whence they emigrated—citizens of the despotisms of the Old World—are permitted to exercise the right of suffrage, to make and unmake constitutions, to elect Governors, legislators, and judges; to participate equally with naturalized and native-born citizens in the administration of this Government.

This power, so dangerous to our institutions, if unwisely and unpatriotically exercised, is possessed by the people of no one of the States of this Union. It was surrendered to the General Government, by the people of the United States, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

The eighth section of that instrument confers upon Congress the power "to establish a uniform system of naturalization," and at the close of that section it is declared that Congress may "make all laws which shall be necessary for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." Congress, in the exercise of that power, has prescribed, by law, the terms upon which a foreigner can become a citizen of the United States. Although born under a despotism, and reared beneath the frowns and oppressive rule of a tyrant, he may here, upon this soil consecrated to freedom, become a citizen of the United States, and enjoy all the privileges and immunities of a native-born American citizen. But that law, the policy of which was adopted by the early fathers of the Republic, required that he shall have resided within the limits, and under the jurisdiction of the United States, for the term of five years; that he shall be a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States. And when these facts are established to the satisfaction of a court having competent jurisdiction, he is not yet a citizen of the United States; but to entitle him to that noble appellation, and the inestimable rights that attach thereto, he must declare, on oath or affirmation, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he doth, absolutely and entirely, renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty whatever; and, particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, State, or sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject; and this proceeding is placed upon the records of the court. But this constitution, in defiance of this wise enactment by Congress, picks up a raw foreigner, who is ignorant of our manners and customs, our language, our laws and institutions, and by its magical influence, in the brief period of one year after he touches the soil and breathes the atmosphere of Minnesota, endows him with all the attributes and qualifications of a citizen.

I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the United States, by the adoption of the Federal Constitution, clothed Congress with the exclusive power of conferring upon foreigners the right of citizenship; and the Supreme Court of the United States have so affirmed. But, sir, I am met by the assertion that he is not a citizen of the United States by this provision in the constitution of Minnesota, but only a citizen of that State. Permit me to say, in the language of Senator Horst, that "it is an absurdity to say that a man can be a citizen of a State with Federal relations, who is not a citizen of the United States; and that an alien can have a right, by virtue of State authority, to vote for members of Congress and presidential electors, because the State confers upon him the power to vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislature." Are not the right to hold office and the exercise of the elective franchise, both guaranteed to aliens under this State constitution, the highest possible elements of citizenship that can be conferred? Is not the exercise of this power on the part of the people of Minnesota in direct conflict with the power and authority of Congress, expressly granted by the Constitution of the United States? Both cannot exercise it. Either one or the other possesses it exclusively. Can there be any doubt as to which? None, I apprehend, except with those who permit their zeal for "State rights" to warp their minds and bias their judgments.

I, sir, profess to be an unyielding advocate for all the rights that can be fairly and rationally claimed by the States of this Confederacy. But, when the States have clearly and unquestionably parted with a right, let us yield it up. Can any one doubt that it was designed and intended by the framers of the Constitution of the United States that there should be uniformity throughout the whole Confederacy in the naturalization of foreigners? that the power should be exercised alone by the national Legislature? Congress, in the exercise of its power—for the purpose of guarding our institutions against the influence of foreign sentiments, principle, and prejudices, which might be impressed upon our laws and government through the ballot-box—has declared that a probation of five years' residence in our midst, and under the influence of our institutions, is necessary on the part of a foreigner to qualify him for citizenship; and yet the people of Minnesota, in violation of the express will of Congress, declared by virtue of and in conformity to the Constitution of the United States, assume the authority to say that foreigners after one year's residence shall be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage; shall go to the polls and nullify the votes of native-born and naturalized citizens, and mold, to some extent, the institutions of the State, and control its future destinies.

I warn gentlemen from the South of the consequences that must result from maintaining the right of unnaturalized foreigners to vote in the formation of State constitutions. The whole of the Territories of this Union are rapidly filling up with foreigners. The great body of them are opposed to slavery. Mark my word: if you do it, another slave State will never be formed out of the Territories of this Union. They are the enemies of the South and her institutions.

I desire to call the attention of the members of this House to the following extracts from a speech of the illustrious statesman of South Carolina, John C. Calhoun, delivered in the Senate of the United States, upon the application of Michigan for admission into the Union. The principal objection urged by Mr. Calhoun to the admission of Michigan, was that her constitution conferred upon aliens the right of suffrage. He said—

"The Constitution confers on Congress the authority to pass uniform laws of naturalization. This will not be questioned; nor will it be, that the effect of naturalization is to remove alienage." * * * "To remove alienage, is simply to put the foreigner in the condition of a native-born. To this extent the act of naturalization goes; and no further."

"The next position I assume is no less certain; that when Congress has exercised its authority by passing a uniform law of naturalization, (as it has,) it excludes the right of exercising a similar authority on the part of the State. To suppose that the States could pass naturalization acts of their own, after Congress had passed a uniform law of naturalization, would be to make the provision of the Constitution nugatory." * * * "I have shown that a citizen is not an alien, and that alienage is an insuperable barrier, till removed, to citizenship; and that it can only be removed by complying with the act of Congress. It follows of course, that a State cannot, of its own authority, make an alien a citizen without such compliance. To suppose it can, involves, in my opinion, a confusion of ideas, which must lead to innumerable absurdities and contradictions."

"Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to what other rights appertain to a citizen, all must at least agree that he has the right to petition, and also to claim the protection of his Government. These belong to him as a member of the body politic, and the possession of them is what separates citizens of the lowest condition from aliens and slaves. To suppose that a State can make an alien a citizen of the State—or, to present the question more specifically, can confer on him the right of voting, would involve the absurdity of giving him a direct and immediate control over the action of the General Government, from which he has no right to claim protection, and to which he has no right to present a petition. That the full force of the absurdity may be felt, it must be borne in mind that every department of the General Government is either directly or indirectly under the control of the voters in the several States. The Constitution wisely provides that the voters for the most numerous branch of the Legislatures in the several States, shall vote for the members of the House of Representatives; and, as the members of this body are chosen by the Legislatures of the States, and the presidential electors either by the Legislatures or voters in the several States, it follows, as I have stated, that the action of the General Government is either directly or indirectly under the control of the voters in the several States. Now, admit that a State may confer the right of voting on all aliens, and it will follow, as a matter of necessary consequence, that we might have among our constituents persons who have not the right to claim the protection of the Government, or to present a petition to it. I would ask my colleague if he would willingly bear the relation of Representative to those who could not claim his aid, as Senator, to protect them from oppression, or to present a petition, through him, to the Senate, praying for a redress of grievances? And yet such might be his condition on the principle for which he contends.

"But a still greater difficulty remains. Suppose a war should be declared between the United States and the country to which the alien belongs—suppose, for instance, that South Carolina should confer the right of voting on alien subjects of Great Britain residing within her limits, and that war should be declared between the two countries: what, in such event, would be the condition of that portion of our voters? They, as alien enemies, would be liable to be seized under the laws of Congress, and to have their goods confiscated and themselves imprisoned or sent out of the country. The principle that leads to such consequences cannot be true; and I venture nothing in asserting that South Carolina, at least, will never give it her sanction or consent to act in it. She never will assent to incorporate, as members of her body politic, those who might be placed in so degraded a condition and so completely under the control of the General Government."

Mr. Calhoun also inquires into the objects of the Constitution in conferring on Congress the authority of passing uniform laws of naturalization, and says:

"In conferring this power, the framers of the Constitution must have had two objects in view: one to present competition between the States in holding out inducements for the emigration of foreigners; and the other to prevent their improper influence over the General Government, through such States as might naturalize foreigners, and could confer on them the right of exercising the elective franchise, before they could be sufficiently informed of the nature of our institutions, or were interested in their preservation. Both of these objects would be defeated, if the States may confer on aliens the right of voting, and the other privileges belonging to citizens. On that supposition, it would be almost impossible to conceive what good could be obtained, or evil prevented, by conferring the power on Congress. The power would be perfectly nugatory. A State might hold out very improper inducements to emigration, as freely as if the power did not exist, and might confer on the alien all the political privileges belonging to a native-born citizen, not only to the great injury of the government of the State, but to an improper control of the Government over the Union. To illustrate what I have said, suppose the dominant party in New York, finding political power about to depart from them, should, to maintain their ascendancy, extend the right of suffrage to the thousands of aliens of every language, and from every portion of the world, that annually pour into her great emporium: how deeply might the destiny of the whole Union be affected by such a measure! It might in fact place the control over the General Government in the hands of those who know nothing of our institutions, and are indifferent as to the interests of the country." * * *

"Michigan has attempted to confer the right to vote on aliens. She has no authority to confer such right under the Constitution. I have conclusively shown that a State does not possess it, much less a Territory, which possesses no power except such as is conferred by Congress. Congress has conferred no such power on Michigan, nor, indeed, could confer it, as it has no authority, under the Constitution, over the subject, except to pass uniform laws of naturalization."

Thus spoke the distinguished southern statesman.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that the foreign emigration to the United States for one year should concentrate in Minnesota: do we not know that they would have the complete control of the government of that State, with all its machinery and officers? Are we, the inheritors of the best and noblest Government on the earth, with institutions fashioned and approved by patriots of revolutionary memory, willing to exhibit to the gratified gaze of the crowned heads of Europe the strange and monstrous spectacle of one of the States of this Union filled and taken possession of by their subjects, and its government controlled and administered by them? Sir, let the honor of our country, the memory of our fathers, and the purity and sacredness of the ballot-box, forbid it.

The aspirants for political elevation, who would hazard the dearest interests of this Union to gratify their unhallowed ambition, and who are ever courting this foreign power and influence, have not only induced the people of Minnesota (many of whom are doubtless foreigners) to place themselves in a condition where they may have to submit to foreign will and dictation, but they have actually conferred upon the ignorant, degraded savage, the elective franchise.

Indians of mixed blood, the tawny sons of the forests, are also to participate in the administration of the government. Roving savages, who have been raised in the wigwam and the chase, as ignorant of our laws and institutions as the Hottentots, are to have shirts put upon their backs and hats upon their heads, as evidence that they have adopted the customs and habits of civilization, and then to be marched to the polls, under the lead of some aspiring demagogue, to select a Governor, judges of the supreme court, and legislators. What a mockery of popular sovereignty! what an outrage upon free government! what a libel upon the character of our boasted institutions! Are we, the Representatives of the freest and most enlightened nation on earth—we, who have been placed here upon the watch-tower of liberty, to guard with sleepless vigilance the purity and sacredness of the ballot-box, the great avenue of approach to the citadel of our liberties, to permit a people asking us to confer upon them State sovereignty thus to cheapen and dishonor the elective franchise, and endanger the stability of our institutions? Are we to permit the destiny of one of the States of this Confederacy by possibility to be placed in the keeping of unnaturalized foreigners and Indians? Sir, I would fain hope that the intelligence and patriotism of a majority of the American population of Minnesota forbid it.

But, sir, what is still more strange, the people of Minnesota, not satisfied with the bestowment of suffrage upon the subjects of the kings and potentates of Europe, have declared in their fundamental law that a residence of twelve months will qualify them to become Senators and Representatives of the State Legislature, judges of the supreme and district courts; and that the moment they become naturalized citizens they are qualified to occupy the gubernatorial chair—veto laws passed by the Representatives of the people, and act as commander-in-chief of the military and naval forces. And not satisfied with furnishing to us this evidence of their appreciation of the interesting population of the different nations of Europe that are now being daily thrown upon our shores, the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the schedule provide that upon the second Tuesday, the 13th day of October, 1857, an election shall be held for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, Governor, Lieutenant Governor, supreme and district judges, members of the Legislature, and all other officers designated in this constitution; and also the submission of this constitution to the people for their adoption or rejection.

Upon the day so designated as aforesaid, every free white male inhabitant over the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided in the limits of the State for ten days previous to the day of said election, may vote for all officers to be elected under this constitution at such election, and also for or against the adoption of this constitution.

Not satisfied with the permanent rights of suffrage, conferred upon aliens under the constitution, after twelve months' residence, to cap the climax of this submission to foreign influence, every foreigner, who had resided ten days within the limits of the State, though it may not have been more than twenty days since he landed upon our shores, fresh from the hot-beds of despotism, with no declared intention of ever becoming a citizen of the United States, was permitted to vote for or against the constitution, for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and for all State officers.

Sir, the proud temple of our liberty is now tottering amidst the frantic and damning waves of sectionalism and Red-Republicanism that lash its base. The virtue, intelligence, and devotion to country, of our own citizens reared under the shadow of the star-spangled banner, with its hallowed and patriotic associations, are now being tested to the utmost extent, in the attempt to preserve our glorious Union; and from present indications, the strong probability is, that we shall prove inadequate to the task. And yet, at this critical period in the history of our country, we are asked to admit a State into this Union, whose destiny may be controlled by men born, raised, and educated in foreign countries; enveloped in, the dark mantle of despotism; with thoughts, feelings, and sentiments unlike ours, many of whom have come hither under the delusive idea that freedom consists in whatever their unbridled wills may dictate. Do the great body of these aliens possess the qualifications indispensably necessary to enable them to exercise intelligently the right of suffrage. Many of them; ay, a large majority, are wholly ignorant of our language, the machinery of our Government, the genius and spirit of our institutions; and yet strange to tell, we are asked to place them, while under allegiance to a foreign Government, incapable of committing treason against our own, on a full and perfect equality with native-born citizens, the sons of our soil, the legitimate inheritors of this Government, to put in their keeping, and under their guidance—in part at least—our country and its institutions.

Yes; we, with revolutionary blood coursing our veins; we, who have been taught from our childhood to look upon the flag of our Union with emotions of pride and admiration; we, who have drunk the milk of republicanism from our earliest infancy; we, who have made the scenes of the Revolution our daily companions, and held constant communion with the spirits of our ancestors, yet breathing in the glorious institutions under which "we live, and move, and have our being," are boldly asked to confer—not upon naturalized foreigners, but upon aliens, subjects of the crowned heads of Europe, men who owe allegiance to foreign potentates and Powers, the sworn enemies of our institutions—all the rights and immunities of naturalized and native-born citizens; to bestow upon them an equal participation with us in the making of State laws, in the administration of a State government, and even in the election of Representatives and Senators to the national Legislature. Think you that they are competent to the performance of these high political functions? No; you know they are not. Why, then, indorse such an enormous political heresy? Why perpetrate such a monstrous outrage upon the rights of American and naturalized citizens? Others may do it if they choose. I, for one, shall never be instrumental in conferring upon that army of foreigners now being landed upon our shores—numbering from three to five hundred thousand every year—political power before they have even served out the short probation required by the laws of the land, enacted in obedience to the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, this is said to be an age of progress. In the arts and sciences, in mechanics and agriculture, it is emphatically so; but, in my humble judgment, so far as the science of government is concerned, it is an age of reckless innovation and wild adventure. Neither laws nor constitutions can stay the ruthless hand of demagogism and political empiricism. Every barrier erected by the purest patriotism, operating on the highest intelligence, must give way before the fell spirit of party, and the inordinate and selfish ambition of man. Sir, the question may well force itself upon every reflecting mind, is the nationality of this mighty Republic to be destroyed? Are our laws to be made and our constitutions to be framed by foreigners? Are we no longer able to govern ourselves; to pilot the mighty ship of State, so nobly and majestically fashioned and safely launched upon the ocean of freedom by our illustrious ancestors?

Is this country dedicated to human liberty; rich in all the varied productions of earth; possessing every element of material and political greatness and beauty, magnificence and prosperity, that the human mind can conceive of or the human heart desire, to be the great receptacle of the overflowing nations of the globe, into whose bosom is to be thrown the redundant population of the Old World, many of whom are transmitted by their Governments in consequence of their crimes and poverty? And are they to be our peers in the executive, judicial, and legislative administration of our Government, as are American citizens, born beneath the flag of my country. With revolutionary blood coursing my veins, I solemnly protest against it. Let others do as they may, I shall not vote for the admission of a State into this Union whose constitution tolerates alien suffrage, so long as I remain a member of the American Congress.

Sir, I ask not to close our doors against the "downtrodden" millions of Europe—the honest and industrious—let them come; this is the "Land of the free and the home of the brave."

Let them be protected in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property. Let them become familiar with our institutions, our form of government, the principles upon which it is administered. Let them learn our language, become assimilated to us in our manners and customs, our thoughts, feelings and sentiments. Let them learn fully to comprehend the inestimable value of the political, civil, and religious blessings that we enjoy. In other words, let them become fully Americanized, and then, and not till then, should they divide with us the honors and responsibilities of Government. This is what the patriotic and sensible foreigner demands; surely Americans should demand no less.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I desire to address the House on this question before the vote is taken. I do not desire to have the vote taken to-day; but as no other member is seeking the floor, I move to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to address the House on this subject; but if any arrangement is desired to be made for to-day, I will make my remarks to-morrow.

The question was taken on Mr. STEPHENS's motion, and it was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BURNETT in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 201, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, the pending question being on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RUFFIN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON], to strike out of lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine the following words: "draughtsmen employed on the land maps;" and in line one hundred and forty-one to strike out the words "$25,000," and insert the words "$8,440."

Mr. BRANCH. When the committee was last in session, the Chair ruled as out of order the proviso, proposed by my colleague, repealing the resolution of the 18th of May, 1843. I think that the chairman was then under a misapprehension, and did not understand that it was only a resolution of the House, and not a law of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that, although the original resolution under which the clerks were employed might not strictly be called legislation, yet the proviso attached to the amendment of the gentleman's colleague would certainly be independent legislation in this bill. For that reason the Chair ruled it out of order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I want to have my question of order settled. What is the rule upon the subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that both the amendments propose to strike out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, the rule, as I understand it, is, that where one motion is to perfect the bill, and the other to strike out entirely, the motion to perfect the bill takes precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will notice the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, he will see that the point he makes is not well taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. If the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina shall be successful, it will abolish these map clerks, as I understand it.

Mr. RUFFIN. That will be its effect.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Then I trust it will be voted down.

Mr. RUFFIN. I submit that debate is not in order.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I understand that, if that amendment is adopted, these clerkships will be abolished.

Several MEMBERS. Yes! yes!

Mr. PHELPS demanded tellers on Mr. RUFFIN's amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. RUFFIN and DEAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on Mr. STANTON's amendment.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Will not that amendment reduce the force to the point recommended by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The reduction from $25,000 to $17,000 will cause a reduction of the force from nine to five—to three clerks and two draughtsmen—which has been recommended by the Committee on Public Lands; and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. When will that take place?

Mr. COBB. The first of next month.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

For two mail boys at $900 each, and messenger in charge of the southern extension, $3,300.

This amendment does not increase the appropriation. It is offered at this particular point so that it may come under the head of contingent expenses. It provides the salary for the boys who carry the members' mails. The appropriation is in accordance with law, and this amendment is made here for the purpose of correcting a clerical mistake.

Mr. MASON. It may be all true what the gentleman has said that this is in accordance with law. When the messengers in the office of the postmaster of the House received $2 50 a day, they carried these mails themselves; but just so soon as their salaries are advanced to $1,400 a year they got to be above that duty, and had substitutes employed to do their work. There are, then, two sets of officers employed for doing the same duty. If it is the pleasure of the House to continue these sinecure places, they can agree to this appropriation. It is in accordance with law, of course, for these messengers to have fellows appointed and paid out of the Treasury to do their work for them. I am opposed to the whole system that is going on here.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am willing to go with the gentleman for reform at the proper place, but I am unwilling to put general legislation upon the appropriation bills. These mail carriers are provided for by law, and their salaries are fixed by law. This appropriation, then, is simply in accordance with law. The object of it is to make it consistent with the resolution by which they were created, which provides for their pay from the contingent fund.

If my friend, I repeat, will commence his reform by moving to repeal bad laws and resolutions, I will go with him. I will go with him to abolish these map clerks, and to reduce salaries where they ought to be reduced.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman is full in his promises; but I introduced a bill in the early part of the session providing for reform here, and the gentleman voted against it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. What bill was that?

Mr. MASON. The bill regulating all the officers of this House. I noticed, too, that the gentleman voted to continue these land-map clerks, and that he is opposed to a change of the law in that respect.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am opposed to such a change in the appropriation bills.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman would not vote to sustain the Committee of Accounts in repealing the law in a separate measure. I am not here with any expectation of being able to stop these appropriations. It seems, sir, that all these appropriations can be passed, but every manner of objection and delay is interposed to the passage of the old soldiers' pension bill. Every means, every rule and law are used to prevent the passage of that measure, which provides for those who have meritoriously served their country.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That bill is not under consideration; and I make the point that the gentleman is not in order in debating it.

Mr. MASON. Nothing is in order except what relates to this extravagant system of map clerks, and what not.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am sorry that the gentleman has worked himself up into the state of feeling he has.

Mr. SEWARD. I thought we were under the five minute rule. If so, then the gentleman is not in order, for there has been one speech in favor of the amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and one against it by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will move to add five cents to the appropriation, to get rid of the gentleman's point. I hope that will not be considered too extravagant an increase.

Mr. SEWARD. As the gentleman seems to stand on etiquette, I will insist that his remarks shall be confined to the reasons for an increase of five cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Very well; I hope that I will be allowed to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, who saw fit to make an attack upon me.

Mr. MASON. I did not make an attack; I stated facts.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out of that amendment "$3,000." I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how many messengers and mail boys we employ in the post office, and what the necessity for them is? I recollect when we had but four messengers, at a compensation of $2 50 per day. Their compensation was increased, from time to time, until it was made $1,400 per annum. After that the messengers employed mail boys, at twenty-eight or thirty dollars per month, during the session. More recently, they have duplicated all the messengers there, by giving them mail boys at a salary of $900 per annum each. I can see no necessity for both the mail boys and the messengers, and therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say that there are five messengers employed. I have already said they are employed in pursuance of law. There is an act of Congress directing their employment. Their salaries are fixed. If it is the pleasure of the committee to repeal these laws by refusing to appropriate the money to carry them out, I want them to understand that I have no feeling upon the subject, though I do not consider that a proper mode of proceeding. If they refuse to appropriate money to pay a debt, I have no feeling upon the subject, though I am not in favor of repealing a law in that way. Upon them be the responsibility. We are bound to appropriate money according to law, but the committee have the power to refuse to pay its debts if it chooses.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the gentleman under what law the messengers or mail-boys provided by this amendment are appointed, and by what law their employment is authorized?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have not the law or resolution at hand, but if it is the pleasure of the committee to have the law or resolution read, I can have it hunted up in a short time. The estimates are sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, based upon laws, or upon resolution. They are sometimes based upon acts of Congress, sometimes upon joint resolutions, and sometimes upon simple resolutions of the House. Those appropriations which relate exclusively to the House itself, such as the salaries of its officers, &c., are based upon our own resolutions, and are paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment—to strike out "$3,000;" and it was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania,

Mr. GREENWOOD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JACKSON and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. With the permission of the committee, I will now read the resolution to which I referred:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States be, and he is hereby, ordered to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the two boys accompanying the mail wagon, the same compensation as is paid to boys performing similar duties in the Senate, to commence at the commencement of this Congress, &c.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then there is no authority of law for their appointment.

The House then divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 32.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to add to the amendment just adopted the following:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid to clerks of committees appointed under resolutions of the present House of Representatives.

I have presented that with a view of testing the sincerity of gentlemen on the subject of economy.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman want that provision to apply to the whole bill?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; I only wish it to apply to that portion of the bill which provides payment for the clerks I have referred to.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means to explain why it is that there is an appropriation in the bill for the clerk of the Committee of Claims, one on page 35, and the other on page 5, and one for $1,850 and the other for $1,800, and for the clerks to no other committee?

My proviso, as I have said, is to test the sincerity of gentlemen's professions of economy. Nearly every committee of this House, by resolutions adopted during this session, have been granted leave to employ clerks. I admit that it may be proper for two or three of the principal committees of the House to have clerks, but surely a clerk is not necessary for every committee. I understand that a gentleman who has been loud in the expression of his wish for a reform, had a clerk appointed for the Committee of Accounts, and paid for without authority of law.

A few days ago, when a question was up to appropriate money to carry out a resolution adopted by the House, it was resisted, on the ground that it was extravagant and unnecessary. The gentlemen who voted against that appropriation, in attempting to defend themselves against a charge of repudiation, which I was of the opinion properly attached to them, undertook to say that it was public plunder, an outrage upon the public Treasury, and an unnecessary waste of the public money. Yet some of the gentlemen who urged that argument have been securing the appointment of clerks to committees, under resolutions of the House, and are now willing to vote to pay them. I protested at the time that if the House did not intend to annul all its future action, it should resist the exercise of the power asked for; and I now offer this proviso, to see whether gentlemen will adhere to their former votes.

I will not undertake to go into the question of what control the House has over its contingent fund; but I say that these clerks draw thousands from the Treasury when some of them absolutely do nothing. They are appropriated to the use and convenience of chairmen of committees in order that what these chairmen may say here may in print be circulated through their districts for the advancement of their political interests. If this useless system is to be continued, and these unnecessary clerks are to be employed, I shall insist that one be appointed for each member and Delegate of this House. If the thing is right in part, it is right in the whole. If, by some particular management, any gentleman can ingratiate himself in the affections of the Speaker, and secure an appointment of the head of a committee, I do not understand that that invests him with any extraordinary privileges. Nine times out of ten, and I say it with all respect, the Speaker is most egregiously mistaken in the selection of men as heads of committees. [Laughter.]

By being elevated to the head of these committees, they acquire a fictitious reputation before the country, when we here cannot understand what particular fitness and capacity gave them the office; what capacity for the Judiciary Committee, the Ways and Means Committee, the Public Lands Committee, or any other committee. I am opposed to indorsing men that they may go out to the country as greater men than they really are; and I am opposed to conferring extra privileges upon them in giving each a clerk, to be paid for out of the United States Treasury. I do not reflect on anybody. But, sir, we know that many times these clerks are correspondents of newspapers, and that we see an article frequently inserted in those papers puffing these chairmen and giving them credit to which they are not entitled. [Laughter.] Sometimes they are connected with the Executive Departments, and some of them are reporters.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. If my friend had looked at the third page and had read it, he would have found that the clerks for the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Finance applied to the Senate; that is, a permanent clerk for each of those committees, fixed by law, with a legal salary assigned. On the fifth page he will find that the clerks for the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee of Claims are also permanent clerks in this House, with fixed salaries assigned to them. When he comes to the clause under consideration, let me say that that is intended to meet the case of the clerks who have been appointed under resolution of the House, and who ought to be paid for their service, the House having directed their employment. I think, myself, that perhaps my friend from Georgia had some hand in getting a clerk for the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman is mistaken; I opposed it.

Mr. LETCHER. You did?

Mr. SEWARD. We have no more use for a clerk on that committee than we have for the man in the moon—not a particle.

Mr. LETCHER. I am very glad to hear it, and I will withdraw all that I said; it is so much better than I expected from my friend from Georgia.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman does not usually have such good associates as I am, and that is the reason why he is so much surprised.

Mr. LETCHER. The only question is whether, after directing the clerks to be employed, you will appropriate money to pay them.

Mr. MASON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "proper." I will not ask the gentleman whether he alluded to me as one who has been inconsistent with his professions here.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must call the gentleman to order. I had no opportunity to reply to him.

Mr. MASON. You can reply when I have done.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I want the gentleman to confine his remarks to the propriety of inserting the word "proper." That is the rule that was laid down for me.

Mr. MASON. I will confine them to proper remarks. I only propose to state facts, and they are always proper. And, in the first place, I would advise the gentleman from Georgia, as the President did a certain committee of northern gentlemen, before he makes a charge, to ascertain distinctly whether it is true.

Mr. SEWARD. If I have misrepresented any fact, I should like the gentleman to state what it is.

Mr. MASON. I understand the gentleman to insinuate a charge against me, which has been circulating round in an underhand manner, that notwithstanding that I have opposed all these things, I had myself employed a clerk on the Committee of Accounts. Well, now, that is not so. The Committee of Accounts some time ago employed a temporary messenger.

Mr. SEWARD. Did you not use him as a clerk?

Mr. MASON. No, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, a messenger is much worse.

Mr. MASON. Mr. SPINNER, one of the members of the committee, had most of the time of this temporary messenger, as he had the examination of accounts for engraving, amounting to $250,000, and he had to run down to the Superintendent of Public Printing day after day to get at the facts necessary, in order to decide fairly upon these claims. The Committee of Accounts had a right to employ a temporary messenger, and it has been done a thousand times. I was on the committee but a short time, and had very little to do with the matter; but I suppose that when the work is done for which this man was employed, the committee will dismiss him, if they have not done so already. He was only temporarily employed for a temporary purpose.

There are various other charges floating around here, proceeding from interested parties, not for the purpose of public benefit, but with the purpose of showing that those who are here standing by the Treasury of the country and the rights of the people have done something wrong. It is a petty little slander.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am very anxious that the House should proceed with the consideration of this bill, as I understand that the Senate are ready for another appropriation bill. I oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. MASON. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. And I will withdraw my amendment, having said all that I want to say.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment.

Insert after the amendment last adopted, as follows:

For furnishing committee rooms, retiring rooms, and offices in the south wing of the Capitol extension with gas fixtures, chandeliers, iron safes, and other furniture, $40,000.

At the time the estimates were made, the expense had not been ascertained for furnishing the committee rooms attached to this Hall with gas fixtures, &c. Various items were neglected; and that explains the reason why the amount is asked for in an amendment instead of being in the original bill. I ask the Clerk to read the letters which I send up.

The Clerk read the letters; as follows:

OFFICE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.,

April 23, 1858.

SIR: In addition to the item "for furniture and repairs, and boxes for members, $10,000," contained in the estimates of appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, under the head of contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, a further sum of $10,000 will be required to furnish the committee rooms, retiring rooms, and offices in the south wing of the Capitol extension, with gas fixtures, chandeliers, iron safes, and other furniture.

Very respectfully,

J. C. ALLEN,
Clerk of the House of Representatives U. S.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES,
Chairman Committee Ways and Means.

OFFICE OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 29, 1858.

SIR: Your letter of the 28th, asking further explanations in regard to the estimate from this office of $40,000 required to furnish committee rooms, retiring rooms, offices, &c., in the south wing of the Capitol, has been duly received, and I hasten to answer the interrogatories propounded. First, you ask:

"Of the different articles provided for in said estimate, what amount was furnished by the former Clerk of the House of Representatives, and what amount by yourself?"

This estimate simply covers the articles already furnished by me, and which will be required during the ensuing fiscal year. And it may not be out of place here to state, that the committee rooms were furnished in accordance with requisitions from the chairman of committees occupying said rooms—the various offices under direction of their respective heads—and the remaining offices and rooms after consultation with the Speaker of the House of Representatives. In the selection of the furniture, great care has been taken in regard to durability and cheapness, with the view of protecting the Government from excessive charges by the employment of several intermediate agents. I visited nearly all the heavy manufactories and warehouses in New York and Philadelphia, and directed the purchases myself. The Committee of Accounts delegated two of their number to examine the articles purchased, with the bills for the same. Both gentlemen have expressed themselves as being entirely satisfied with the prices, quality, and durability of the furniture.

In the month of February last, bills were filed in this office by Mr. Fitzhugh for the sum of nearly nine thousand dollars, mainly for carpets and upholstery in the new Hall, and certified to by Mr. Cullom, the late Clerk. Thus far, these are the only bills left unpaid by my predecessor, for furniture and repairs. They are not included in the estimate of $40,000, in consequence of their suspension by the Committee of Accounts in consequence of alleged excessive charges.

Second, you ask, "What amount has been heretofore appropriated by Congress or estimated for by the late Clerk of the House of Representatives, or by yourself, for any or all of the items contained in the aforesaid estimate?"

The customary appropriations by the past and several preceding Congresses for furniture and repairs, including boxes for members, &c., has been from ten to twelve thousand dollars. The late Clerk's estimate for the ensuing fiscal year is placed at $10,000, the usual amount. The sum now estimated by me ($40,000) will be required in addition to that amount, for the purposes already designated.

Very respectfully,

J. C. ALLEN,
Clerk House of Representatives, United States.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES,
Chairman Committee Ways and Means.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish the committee to understand that this is a debt incurred by the Government for furnishing the rooms attached to this Hall—for gas fixtures, pipes, furniture, &c. The debt has been already incurred, and this is an appropriation to pay it.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Will he explain to me how this can be a proper appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, and why it was not put into the deficiency bill for the current year?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This was not a matter to which I attached much importance. The estimate was sent in by the Clerk of the House, as such estimates usually are. The goods have been already furnished; but, from my understanding of the case, they will not be paid for before the 1st of next July. The estimate was not sent in in time for the deficiency bill. Perhaps the gentleman is right technically. If it be the pleasure of the House not to pay for the furniture, why it may vote down the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose if it is a debt of the Government, it must be paid; and if the Government has not got the money, I suppose it must borrow it. I listened to the reading of these letters from the Clerk. There was a good deal said in them about desks and seats for members, and all that; but not one word about the $30,000 appropriated in the deficiency bill for the same object. There was $30,000 appropriated in the deficiency bill which was signed here this week by the Speaker, and approved by the President; and now here is an appropriation of $40,000 in this bill for furniture for committee rooms, and retiring rooms, &c. I should prefer to have seen all the items together.

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend by striking out $40,000 and inserting $10,000. I take it for granted, Mr. Chairman, that this matter has got to be paid. It is said that the debt has been contracted; but if there is any sense, or propriety, or necessity for keeping the expenses of different fiscal years in separate accounts, and throwing on each year the responsibility of its proper expenditure, then it is perfectly clear that this item has no place in this bill. Here is a bill for the expenses of the Government from the first of July, 1858, to the first of July, 1859. In that bill the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to interpolate an item for expenditures which have been already incurred, and which belong to the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858; and which it was the business of the committee to incorporate in the deficiency bill. If a second deficiency bill was necessary, it might have been introduced; but I do hold that it is a matter of importance that each Administration, and each fiscal year should be charged with the legitimate and proper amount of expenditures made during that year. Congress is responsible, the Administration is responsible, and there ought to be a proper responsibility for each year.

Therefore I am opposed to it entirely; and I insist that the Committee of Ways and Means shall report proper bills making these appropriations for deficiencies in the expenses of the current year. The idea that they may contract a debt, incur a liability, and make an expenditure, because they do so on credit, and let it go over to the ensuing fiscal year as belonging to the expenses of that fiscal year, is altogether absurd, and is a practice which the House ought not to tolerate for a single moment.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire simply to say this: The item in the deficiency bill was for articles furnished for the committee rooms and for this Hall, by the preceding Clerk of the House of Representatives, General Cullom. They were purchases made by him to be paid for out of the year between the 1st of July, 1857, and the 30th of June, 1858. Hence it was that they were embraced in a deficiency bill.

After we came here, the present Clerk was directed to go on and furnish the committee rooms of the House, and to procure articles for other portions of this building. In the discharge of that duty, he has been receiving furniture for some time past, is receiving some now, and will receive some for days to come; and having no money on hand, he had, as a matter of course, in the execution of an order of the House, to make his purchases with reference to the appropriation in the annual appropriation bill for the year commencing 1st July next, and terminating the 30th of June, 1859. Where else were we to put this item? Could we come here and say that it was a deficiency, when, at the same time the deficiency bill was up, not even the amount of the purchase was known, when the articles themselves were not obtained, nor the prices ascertained? How was it to be done? When the gentleman undertakes to arraign the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject, will he be good enough to explain to us how the Committee of Ways and Means could have a knowledge of the liabilities, when the Clerk of the House had not made his purchases under the order of the House? How was it to be done?

Mr. STANTON. I will answer the gentleman. I take it for granted that the whole financial policy of the Government goes upon the idea that the various officers of the Government are to anticipate what will be the necessary expenditures of the coming year in the various departments of the Government, and they are to make their calculations of what their contracts for the coming year will be, and to conform their estimates to those calculations, and then to regulate their expenditures accordingly.

Mr. LETCHER. If that be so, will the gentleman undertake to tell me how the Clerk of the last Congress could know that this Hall would be occupied this session, and how the Clerk of the Senate could have known that the new Senate Hall would not be occupied this session?

Mr. STANTON. I take it for granted he could have got the information from the architect. It is his business to know when the Hall would be ready for occupation.

Mr. LETCHER. The occupation of the Hall depended upon the action of the House alone. The Clerk could not move us here, nor could he furnish the Hall without the order of the House. We could not come here until the House resolved to come; and when we did resolve to come, great doubt was expressed as to the propriety and safety of doing so in the unfinished state of the Hall.

Mr. STANTON. Upon what authority did the former Clerk, Mr. Cullom, order the furniture for this Hall?

Mr. LETCHER. Upon such authority as Captain Meigs furnished.

Mr. STANTON. We have been in this Hall since December last. Could not the Clerk, before the deficiency bill was reported, have made the estimates?

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir, he could not; and simply because the Hall is not furnished yet. You cannot tell now what is to be procured for the purpose of completing the furniture necessary to fill up this building. Even now the floors are not laid. They are progressing; and because the Clerk could not ascertain that, the gentleman arraigns the committee for not knowing what God Almighty alone, in his foreknowledge, could know.

Mr. STANTON. How does the Secretary of War know what supplies the Army will need for the coming year?

Mr. LETCHER. For the simple and plain reason that he knows what number of men constitute the Army, what number of officers there are, what quality and quantity of clothing is required for each of them, the number of rations, and all the various other articles required. There is a fixed number given, upon which to make the calculation. But is there anything fixed here? There is nothing of that sort.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw my amendment if there is no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I renew the amendment. I understand my friend from Virginia to say that $30,000 was to pay for furniture purchased by the late Clerk. The item reads, I believe, "For furniture for Speaker's room, committee rooms, Clerk's office, Sergeant-at-Arms' office, retiring room, &c., $30,000." Neither the Sergeant-at-Arms' room, nor the retiring room, were finished when we moved into this Hall; and not for some time afterwards. I may be mistaken; but I have been under the impression that the present Clerk had bought the furniture for the Speaker's room, the Sergeant-at-Arms' room, and the retiring room. My impression upon another point was, that the different committees, on taking possession of their respective rooms, had them furnished according to their own notions. There ought to be something like a system about it; and it would have been better, perhaps, to have had a committee, or some person, appointed, to determine what sort of furniture should be placed in those rooms, and in what manner they should be fitted up.

I see in the report of the late Clerk as to the manner in which the contingent fund of the House was disbursed for the last Congress, a charge of thirty dollars for a mirror for the room of the Committee on Roads and Canals. Who ordered it I do not know; but I have never heard of a meeting of that committee since I have been in Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman asks who gave the order to furnish the room of the Committee on Roads and Canals? If the committee have not met, whose fault is it? It strikes me that we sent the subject of the Pacific railroad to that room to be considered, and we sent the Portland and Louisville canal down there at the same time. What the reason is that they have not met to consider these important questions, and presented their action to this House, I do not know.

Mr. RITCHIE. I wish to say a word in answer to the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee that the Committee on Roads and Canals have not met since he has been in Congress. During the Thirty-Third Congress, I was a member of that committee, and we did meet repeatedly, and had sundry grave discussions upon important questions of internal improvements. If the committee has not met since the gentleman has been placed upon the committee, it must be from neglect upon his own part. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If they had important discussions, they were confined to the committee-room.

Mr. RITCHIE. No, sir; they were brought into this House and passed upon. They reported, I recollect, a bill turning over to Illinois what remained of the old national road.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Very important legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. RITCHIE. And other matters of equal importance. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. If I understand this matter, it is precisely as I have stated it heretofore. The furniture for these rooms to which the gentleman refers, or a portion of it, was furniture which was purchased by the late Clerk of the House; and it will be recollected that they were to some extent, and to a considerable extent, furnished at the time we came into and occupied this Hall. The furnishing has been going on since under the direction of the present Clerk.

Now, as to the gentleman's ideas of uniformity, and as to the procurement of the furniture, I know nothing. I know only from what I have heard, that the chairmen of the several committees directed their rooms to be furnished new, according to the practice which has prevailed for a long time. Whether that is a wise or good system, or whether it would be better to abolish it, are questions which would more properly arise at some other time, than upon a question of performing contracts already made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman who ordered the furniture for the room of the Committee of Ways and Means, and what it will cost? Was it done by the old Clerk or by the new one?

Mr. LETCHER. I imagine it was ordered by the chairman of our committee. What it will cost I do not know. I suppose every chairman of a committee has done the same thing.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand there is an account for a book-case for that room, costing $800.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The amendment of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was then agreed to.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the following amendment:

At page 9, line one hundred and ninety, strike out the words " $7.00," and insert in lieu thereof the words " $350."

So that the clause will read:

For contingent expenses of the executive office, including stationery therefor, $350.

I send up the letter to be read, which will explain the amendment.

The letter was read, as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 2, 1858.

DEAR SIR: I beg to direct your attention to the renewal of the annual appropriation for a steward to the President's House, and the messenger to the executive office.

By an economical expenditure of the sum appropriated last year for the contingent expenses of the executive office, I have remaining in the Treasury nearly one half of the appropriation, as a balance to be carried over to the coming year, and thus with a small addition of about three hundred dollars, which I beg you will consider, will suffice for the expenses of the office for the coming year.

Very respectfully, your most obedient,

J. BUCHANAN HENRY,
Private Secretary to the President.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES,

Chairman Committee Ways and Means.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

At the end of line three hundred and ten, strike out "$600," and insert in lieu thereof, "$1,000," so that the clause will read: for blank-books, binding, stationery, office furniture, carpeting, and miscellaneous expenses, in which are included two daily newspapers, $1,000.

The original estimate from the Fifth Auditor's office was for $1,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means struck out $400 of it; but afterwards the Fifth Auditor addressed a letter to the committee, showing the necessity for the original appropriation, in order to complete the work. I send up the letter to be read.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

FIFTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, January 27, 1858.

SIR: In the bill which has been reported by your committee, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, I perceive that the sum of $600 only is put down for the contingent expenses of this office, instead of $1,000 asked for. In explanation of the increase over the sum which was provided by Congress for the present year, I have the honor to state that, under the act of Congress of August 18, 1856, "to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems," the duties of the office have been increased, requiring a larger outlay in books, blanks, stationery, &c., which it is estimated will be covered by the $400 increase asked for. These books are all of an expensive character, requiring printed headings, alphabetical arrangements, and ruling. In the organization and perfection of the consular system, under the act aforesaid, and the consular regulations prescribed by the President, under that act, it is already ascertained that the cost of additional books, forms, circulars, stationery, desks, &c., for the year ending December 31, 1857, have reached the sum of two hundred dollars, and upwards, and that when the details of this system shall be perfected and matured, it is estimated that all of $200 additional will be required. In my report of the 5th November last, to the Secretary of the Treasury, of the operations of the office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, the increased duties mentioned are noticed by me in that report as follows:

"The further operations of the office under the act have been to prepare, under the special directions of the Secretary of State, the books and forms necessary to the organization and perfection of the system prescribed by the President, in accordance with the provisions of the said act. Under this system the duties of the office have been increased, requiring the careful attention of the clerks in carrying out its details, which may be stated, in part, as follows:

First. Registering all fees collected, accounted for, and reported by consular officers.
Second. Registering all consular receipts and statements of certified invoices forwarded by the collectors of customs to the Secretary of the Treasury.
Third. Registering and arranging the statements of the rates at which depreciated currency of the country in which the consular officer resides is computed in United States or Spanish dollars, or in silver or gold coins of other countries.

Fourth. Registering and arranging the monthly reports of the rates of exchange prevailing between the ports or places at which the consular officer is located and London, Paris, Amsterdam, Hamburg, and New York.

Fifth. Preparing statistics of the commercial information in reference not only to the trade of the place of the residence of the consular officer, but that of the neighboring country or towns with which it may be connected commercially, or through which the merchandise may be shipped to the United States.

Sixth. Preparing statistics of the prices current of the staple articles of foreign production exported from the country of their residence to the United States.

The detail of this system, it is expected, will be perfected and matured on or before the termination of the quarter ending March 31, 1859; and the results, under the respective heads mentioned, will then be furnished when called for by the Secretary of the Treasury."

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

MURRAY McCONNELL, Auditor.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, House Representatives.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I offer the following amendment:

For balance due to Dr. John Evans, United States geologist for Washington and Oregon Territories, on final

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES. ...No. 125.

adjustment of his accounts with the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the 4th of March, 1857, $3,574 70.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is that in order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order. It is a private claim.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desire to be heard one moment on the point of order raised by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. In the first place, I desire to say that I am authorized by the Committee on Public Lands to offer that amendment; and I think it is in order for this reason: Dr. Evans was appointed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the purpose of making a geological survey and reconnaissance of Washington and Oregon Territories. Appropriations have been made on three several occasions for the purpose of paying the expenses of this survey and its exploration.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order—

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I am discussing a point of order. I am desiring to bring the attention of the Chair to the point of order raised by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I was saying that appropriations for this purpose have been made from time to time, and it is found, on adjustment of the accounts, that there was a balance to the amount of $3,574 due to the geologist. The appropriations were uniformly made in the general appropriation bill, and I am satisfied it is in order under former rulings of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order, it being in the nature of a private claim.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I am not going to discuss the question; but I most respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the 60th rule.

The rule was read as follows:

"80. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. STANTON. For the purpose of getting information from the Committee of Ways and Means, I move to strike out the appropriation for the expenses of the branch Mint at Charlotte, North Carolina. I wish to know what was the amount of money coined there? and whether it is worth while to keep up the Mint there and at Dahlonega?

Mr. LETCHER. I refer the gentleman to the estimates.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman will find in the estimates precisely the amount. I do not think it is very profitable; but I would say to the gentleman, that he can introduce a bill to abolish that branch Mint, if he thinks it should not be longer kept up.

Mr. STANTON. If we do not make the appropriation, we can get rid of the expense.

The clause of the bill providing for the expenses of Utah Territory having been read,

Mr. COLFAX offered the following amendment:

Add, after line seven hundred and two, as follows: And whereas, the law of September 9, 1850, organizing said Territory of Utah, declared that all the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly and Governor thereof shall be submitted to Congress; and if disapproved, shall be null, and of no effect, it is hereby declared that Congress disapproves of all laws of said Territory authorizing or tolerating polygamy, or requiring contributions in the shape of tithes or labor, for the benefit or maintenance of any religious organization whatever.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I raise a question of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman's amendment is not in order.

Mr. COLFAX. Before the Chair makes his decision, I should like to state the reasons why I think the amendment is in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object.

Mr. COLFAX. Then I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will give the gentleman plenty of bills on which he can talk about the Mormons as much as he chooses.

Mr. COLFAX. Does the Chair decide my amendment out of order? and if so, upon what grounds?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does so decide, and will give the gentleman a reason, although it may not be a satisfactory one to him. This is an appropriation bill, and the gentleman proposes a resolution to declare an opinion in regard to the laws of the Territory of Utah, as passed by their Legislature, which has nothing whatever to do, as the Chair understands it, with the bill.

Mr. COLFAX. I am compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I desire to state the reasons why I dissent from that decision.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The appeal is not debatable.

Mr. COLFAX. I have twenty precedents here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable; but if no objection be made, the Chair will hear the suggestions of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COLFAX. I have appealed from the decision of the Chair. If I were to offer an amendment, I could have five minutes to state my reasons.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The only effect of the gentleman's movement will be to break up the committee.

Mr. COLFAX. Well, if gentlemen on the other side will allow me five minutes to state the reasons why I think the amendment is in order—

Mr. MASON. We do not want to hear you.

Mr. COLFAX. Perhaps you may be compelled to hear me on an amendment, whether the gentlemen on the other side wish to or not.

Mr. MASON. You have no right to make us hear you when we do not want to.

Mr. COLFAX. Is the appeal not debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. MORGAN. I demand tellers on the appeal. If gentlemen upon the other side would hear the gentleman from Indiana for five minutes, there would be no trouble.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CHAFFEE, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

The committee commenced dividing.

Mr. COLFAX. I will withdraw the appeal, for reasons which the Chair understands.

No objection being made, the appeal was withdrawn.

Mr. COLFAX moved pro forma to decrease the amount appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Territory of Utah; and said: Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to justify myself for offering the amendment which I did a few minutes ago. I am not willing, while polygamy prevails in Utah, and tithes are unconstitutionally levied upon the citizens of the United States in Utah for the support of an ecclesiastical organization, to pay any money for the support of that Territory. I do not think that we are justified in doing it. I think that Congress should have exercised its prerogative long since, and disapproved the acts of the Territorial Legislature, thereby making them null and void. As no bill has been reported by any of our committees, and as, under our rules, it is almost impossible to compel action upon any others, I offered my amendment just now to an appropriation for the Governor of the Territory of Utah. Congress, in organizing the Territory in 1850, declared that any act passed by the Legislative Assembly and Governor of the Territory, if disapproved by Congress, should thereby become null and void; and I thought this the most appropriate place to declare the disapproval of Congress, and perhaps the only remaining opportunity at this session. Parliamentary usage authorizes it. I find precedents for the insertion of legislative provisions in appropriation bills scattered all through the Statutes at Large.

I find, Mr. Chairman, in the naval appropriation bill of 1852, when your immediate predecessor

(Mr. Boyd) was Speaker of this House, a section declaring that no midshipman should hereafter be appointed unless recommended by the member of Congress representing the district in which the applicant resided; which certainly had no sort of relevancy to the naval appropriation bill. I find that the deficiency bill of 1853 repealed an act of 1852 respecting the absence of territorial officers from their posts of duty, and also parts of the light-house act, neither of which was at all germane to the bill itself.

Still further, the civil and diplomatic bill of 1853 increased the pay of the Vice President and Cabinet to $8,000, and also authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase stocks of the United States, and to reconvey a lot of land to the city of New Castle.

I find, also, that the deficiency bill of 1854, when Mr. Atchison was President of the Senate, and Mr. Linn Boyd Speaker of this House, repeals specially those parts of the public printing act which require that the Printer of one House, and no one else, shall print all the documents of a particular character which may be ordered by both Houses—a repeal which had no reference whatever to the bill itself.

I find still further that in the naval appropriation bill of August 3, 1848, the Secretary of the Navy is instructed to report to the next session of Congress the number of persons flogged in the Navy, the sentence of each, the number of lashes, &c.; which had not the slightest connection with the appropriation bills, direct or indirect; while the propositions which I made are propositions declaring the disapproval of Congress to acts passed by the Legislative Assembly of Utah. The salary of the Governor of that Territory was directly under consideration, and the amendment was germane to that clause of the bill. Having now proven that my amendment was in order, if any of the cases cited above were legally included in the bills named, and it being evident that the majority of the House do not see fit to incorporate it in the bill, as we on this side wish to do, I withdraw the pro forma amendment which I moved, to give me the right of stating the reasons which justified my motion.

Mr. STANTON. I move to strike out the words "in addition to the balances of former appropriations" in the following paragraph:

"To meet the expenses of collecting the revenue from the sale of public lands in the several States and Territories, in addition to the balances of former appropriations."

The law clearly is, that at the expiration of the fiscal year the power to use the money appropriated is gone. You cannot apply a former appropriation to the expenses of a succeeding fiscal year. It must be reappropriated. It cannot be appropriated in these indefinite, indirect terms. We have a right to know how much the aggregate expenses for a particular purpose are to be. If there is to be a sum reappropriated it must be specified how much. If there is a balance of a former appropriation to be reappropriated it must be done in express terms. I move, therefore, to strike out the words I have indicated, leaving it to stand a simple appropriation of so much money.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand that the gentleman does not move to reduce the appropriation, but simply to strike out the last line of the paragraph.

Mr. STANTON. That is all. As the matter now stands, we have no means of knowing whether we are appropriating fifty dollars or one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment. In my opinion, it will accomplish nothing. I think the fund referred to in the words the gentleman proposes to strike out, is subject to the control of the Executive, and that it will make no difference whether the words are stricken out or not.

Mr. STANTON. I insist upon my amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Very well; I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move to amend, by adding the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix furnished for the members and delegates of the House of Representatives, and for the use of the House library, shall be folded and bound by the publishers, and delivered to the Clerk of the House within ninety days after the adjournment of the session of Congress, at sixty-three cents per volume.

I presume there will be no objection. It will be done cheaper than we have had it heretofore, and in a superior manner.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not know whether I understand the gentleman's amendment. Do I understand that it is a reduction of the price for which this work has heretofore been done?

Mr. RUFFIN. It is. It will facilitate the convenience of members by providing that it shall be done in ninety days, as well as to secure the execution of the work in a better manner. This provides that the price shall be sixty-three cents per volume. I understand the price heretofore paid has been seventy-five cents.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I make the same point of order which was made on the amendment offered a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX,] that it is introducing new legislation into an appropriation bill. It proposes to repeal an existing law, and it certainly must be out of order in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana make a point of order upon the amendment?

Mr. SANDIDGE. I do.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that this amendment will save some ten or twelve cents on a volume, which is an object. There is no law now regulating the matter, and I think the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana insist upon his point of order?

Mr. SANDIDGE. Does the Chairman rule the amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has expressed no opinion about it.

Mr. SANDIDGE. Then I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to concur with the gentleman in his point of order. I want the same rule applied to this amendment which was applied to mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This bill makes an appropriation for printing this work, and binding it, but it does not say how it shall be done. This amendment, I think, is clearly in order, because it is pertinent and germane to a portion of the bill. I hope the amendment will be adopted, because by it you will have the work done quicker, better, and cheaper.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. On page 6 of this appropriation bill, provision is made for printing and binding the Globe. There is no law regulating the binding, and therefore no price fixed. The maximum price to be paid is merely named. I think the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have passed the point in the bill referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and it is not in order to go back, unless by unanimous consent. The Chair desires to ask whether there is no law providing for the binding of this work?

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir, there is not, as I understand. There is an appropriation made for binding, on the sixth page of the bill, and I desire to make the suggestion, that by general consent we go back and amend that paragraph to conform with the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MASON. Is it in order to reduce any expenditure here?

No objection being made, the following paragraph was again brought up for consideration:

"For binding twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each member and Delegate of the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $3,097 60: Provided, That no greater price shall be paid for the same, than seventy cents for each volume or part actually bound and delivered."

Mr. LETCHER. I now move to amend so that the word "seventy" be stricken out, and

"sixty-three" inserted, and to add at the end of the paragraph the following:

And provided further, That the work shall be done by the publishers of the Globe, and delivered within ninety days after the adjournment of the session of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If there be no objection, I would propose an amendment in line eight hundred and forty-two, which provides that the compensation of the doorkeeper of the President's House shall be $600; and in the next item, that the compensation of the assistant doorkeeper shall be $438. Now, I think they both perform about the same service. I think they are both men with families, and I do not see why we should make this difference between them. If there be no objection, I move to strike out both items, which are as follows:

"For compensation of the doorkeeper at the President's House, $600."

"For compensation of the assistant doorkeeper at the President's House, $438."

And to insert in lieu thereof:

For compensation of the doorkeeper and assistant doorkeeper at the President's House, $1,200.

The amendment was, by unanimous consent, agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used or applied to the services of another fiscal year, nor be transferred to or used for any other branch of expenditure than that for which it is specifically appropriated.

The committee will remember that in the early part of the session I called the attention of the House to the fact that in several cases balances were taken by the executive officers of the Government, which had been appropriated, in specific terms, for one fiscal year, and applied to another fiscal year; and, in one case, in defiance of an express vote of both Houses of Congress. I am told that it has become an everyday practice to use the balances of appropriations for one fiscal year for the services of another fiscal year, and for a different purpose than that for which they were appropriated. I am told that the practice is authorized by a law upon your statute-book, passed in 1842. How it came to be passed, I do not know. It must have been done in some such scene as this. But, sir, under that law many abuses have grown up in the Executive Departments of the Government. The House, upon my motion, some time ago, ingrafted the same provision upon another bill, which, I understand, the Senate have stricken out. I desire to make the same amendment now, so that the abuses which have grown up may be corrected.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. When the gentleman first offered his amendment to the consular and diplomatic bill, upon its face it seemed to me to be a fair proposition. I think it is now, except that this is not the time, nor the place, to make such a provision. The act of 1842, providing for the transfer of these unexpended balances, is still in force, and the estimates for the year have been made upon the supposition that it would still continue in force. The gentleman from Ohio, therefore, will see that, to adopt this provision now, would require all the estimates for appropriations to be changed. I think the system he recommends is a good one, and I will support a bill to make such a provision for the future, if it is introduced.

But, sir, if the amendment is now adopted, it will require a revision of the entire estimates, and I hope that it will not prevail; but I will go with the gentleman if he will make it prospective, and provide that not one dollar shall hereafter be taken for any purpose other than that for which it was specifically appropriated.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the amendment as it now stands would prevent any money which has been appropriated for an object, I care not what, and contemplated to be expended during the year, for instance, terminating on the 30th of June, 1858, from being used after the 30th of June, 1858, for the purpose for which it was appropriated.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. No, sir; it may be paid out any year subsequently.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman will see that I am right. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The amendment says expressly that the money appropriated for one fiscal year shall not be used for any other fiscal year.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Shall not be used for the service of another fiscal year; that is, that money appropriated for 1858 shall not be used for the service of the Government the year after.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like the gentleman to tell me how we would get along with the appropriations for fortifications and other public works?

Mr. SANDIDGE. I rise to a point of order. This amendment proposes to repeal existing law, and I therefore hold that it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that this provision has heretofore been inserted in former appropriation bills in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that to adopt the latter branch of the amendment would be going far enough at this time; and, as was well remarked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I think the committee have no idea of adopting the first branch of the amendment now, when all estimates have been made. By reference to the record it will be seen that the estimates for many years back—how long I do not know, probably from the organization of the Government—have been made up with reference to the unexpended balances at the end of a fiscal year. For instance, here is an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of accomplishing a certain thing, and $75,000 are expended; $25,000 remains, then, unexpended, and that is taken into account by the officer who makes the estimate for the next year.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. There commences the violation of the law. When we appropriate money for a specific purpose, and these officers begin to expend it for another, and not in the year when its expenditure was authorized, there, I say, begins the violation of the law.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not agree with the gentleman; and I am sure that he will give me credit for being as rigid as anybody ought to be. I do not agree with the gentleman at all as to the impropriety of the practice of the Government. You can as certainly estimate, under the existing practice of the Government, as if you were to carry the unexpended balances into the surplus fund at the end of every fiscal year.

The difference between the rule proposed by the gentleman and the existing rule is, that he proposes that all unexpended balances shall go back into the Treasury, and shall not be used unless reappropriated; whereas the books in the existing practice show the amount unexpended, and which is taken into account by the officer who makes the estimate. The books will show, with as much accuracy as any other fact, what the unexpended balance is, and the amount that is necessary added to that balance, can be estimated for the next year. The estimates have all been made, and made under these circumstances, and therefore I say that the first branch of the gentleman's amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Alabama. I understand the object of this amendment mainly to be to get rid of what is an unauthorized use of the public money. We may differ about the propriety of the means for getting rid of that practice; but there is no difference as to the practice itself. At the last session, both Houses of Congress, after various committees of conference, refused to make any appropriation to defray the expenses of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, for the year 1856; yet the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears, took the appropriations for the previous and preceding year, and paid them out of them.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was stated at the time that there were unexpended balances for that service which would go to pay the expenses of that Territorial Legislature.

Mr. STANTON. Congress may have done right or wrong, and we may have done as other Congresses did; but the point is this: that that practice enables the Secretary of the Treasury to appropriate money to an object for which Congress would not have appropriated it, and for which they refused to appropriate it. He takes it for granted that because Congress appropriated for a previous year, he may use the unexpended balance for the succeeding year, for which it was not appropriated.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman mistakes the case. The money was appropriated for the support of the territorial government, and it was for that object it was expended. The gentleman states his case too broadly.

Mr. STANTON. Now, the question is, if Congress refuses to appropriate money for any particular object of expenditure, shall the Department have the power to use money for that object, so far as a remaining balance is concerned? The Secretary may use money in a fiscal year when Congress refuses to appropriate a dollar, unless this amendment be adopted. The question is, whether Congress shall retain control over the expenditures for the Territories, or of any other expenditures for the current fiscal year, or whether the Secretary shall have control of them.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is a law of Congress which directs the Departments as to how long they may use an appropriation; and they have the right to use it for the purpose for which it was appropriated for the space of two years. If it is not used within that time, it is thrown back into the Treasury. That is the law in relation to appropriations; and if the gentleman desires to alter that, he must repeal and abrogate the law. The object and effect of this amendment is to repeal the law which allows an appropriation to be used for two years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, as there is an amendment to an amendment already pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. My amendment is one which ought to be adopted; but if gentlemen want to discuss the matter I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend by striking out the words, "be transferred," and from that on to the end of the amendment. I want to show to the gentleman exactly the difficulty which will arise from the adoption of this amendment. Take, for example, the pay of the mileage and per diem of members of the House of Representatives. Under the law fixing the salary at $3,000 it requires $916,000 to meet those items. If the gentleman will take the trouble to look at the estimate sent to us, he will find the estimate to be $580,250, in addition to the unexpended balance, to meet that expense. If this proposition had been adopted, and had been so understood by the Department at the time the recommendations were made, we should have had an estimate for $916,000—the amount of money required for that purpose. If the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio shall be adopted, that unexpended balance now on hand of $335,750, which can now be applied with the estimated amount of $580,250, cannot be so applied, and we shall, at some future period, probably at this session, have to make an appropriation amounting to the identical sum of $916,000.

Let us look at it in another point of view. If we apply the balance on hand, and thereby make up the precise amount which the law requires, what harm is done by it? What bad purpose is accomplished by it? Not any, it strikes me. As has been suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, if this arrangement is to be adopted, let it be prospective, and let the Government be prepared to make their estimates in reference to the law when it takes effect. But now you must appropriate $916,000, or take that balance and the estimated amount to make up the required sum.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Virginia will withdraw his amendment, I will propose one.

Mr. LETCHER. I will.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend by adding at the end:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to the present or next fiscal year.

I think the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is very good, if it is to have a prospective operation. By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury you will see by the estimates that it will require $74,064,755 97 for the expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year. That sum is made up by a balance of existing appropriations for the service of the present fiscal year, which may be applied to the service of the year ending June 30, 1859, $16,586,588 35; and of an amount of indefinite and permanent appropriations, $7,165,224 49; and of estimated appropriations proposed to be made for the service of the fiscal year from July 1, 1858, to June 30, 1859, as detailed in the printed estimates, $50,312,943 13. This latter amount is the one now asked to be appropriated for the next fiscal year, and that $50,312,943 13 is ascertained by taking from the estimated items of the civil, the diplomatic, the legislative, executive, and judicial, the Army and the Navy expenses, this $16,586,588 35—the unexpended balance which will remain of the appropriations for the present year. Now, if this amendment is adopted to go into effect the next fiscal year, it will require a rearrangement of every one of the appropriation bills which have been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means at the present session.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman, that all these difficulties have grown out of a violation of law. But, as they are existing, I have modified my amendment so that the law shall commence on the 1st day of January next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is not the end of the next fiscal year. If the gentleman will accept my amendment, it will make it all right.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I have inserted January next, and that will enable the Department to expend all the old appropriations between the 1st of July and the 1st of January; and then the new system will commence. I have also added another clause—which can only be done by unanimous consent—and that is to repeal the old law of August, 1842.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not think the modification will obviate the difficulty, because here are appropriations asked for, based upon the idea of using this unexpended balance of $16,000,000; and if the amendment is adopted, it will, as I said before, make it necessary for the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, and the Committee on Finance in the Senate, to go over the appropriation bills and rearrange them, and instead of appropriating $50,312,943 13, we must appropriate $16,586,588 25 more. Then, sir, if you accept the proviso which I propose, it will carry it into effect after the expiration of the next fiscal year. I object to the modification of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] because he proposes to put this provision of his in force in the middle of a fiscal year. We should conform our legislation to the fiscal year, as the law has established it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand that the gentleman from Ohio accepts the modification of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I do.

Mr. MILLSON. I object.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MILLSON. I have a right to object, and to reply to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; but the gentleman from Virginia will recollect that the gentleman from Ohio accepts the amendment from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MILLSON. The amendment is not now before the committee. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, to amend the amendment, and he cannot withdraw it without unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee closed his remarks, and no gentleman claiming the floor to oppose his amendment, the gentleman from Ohio accepted it.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not claim the floor, because I did not choose to do so out of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] moved that the committee rise, and therefore it was not in order for me to oppose the amendment. Now, I say that the gentleman from Tennessee has no right to withdraw his amendment without unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Ohio could not accept the amendment. I want to say a word or two in opposition to the amendment.

* The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that there will be no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. MILLSON. I merely desire to say that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee—

Mr. LOVEJOY. I make the question of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I presume there is no desire to discuss this matter further.

Mr. MILLSON. I am as impatient of the discussion as any member of the committee; and to show that I wish to terminate discussion on this question, I intend to submit a proposition immediately. But first I wish to say that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee seems to be utterly inconsistent with the object he has in view, for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio has reference only to the amounts appropriated by this bill.

Mr. BISHOP. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut will recollect that the gentleman from Virginia is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not understand that. I supposed that I was opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood that the gentleman from Ohio, who offered the original amendment, modified it by ingrafting upon it what I proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then, sir, I have no amendment pending before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Tennessee will recollect that the Chair propounded the question whether there was any objection to the gentleman from Virginia proceeding out of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am not objecting on that ground.

Mr. MILLSON. I distinctly objected the moment the gentleman from Ohio announced that he accepted that amendment; and I objected on the ground that the amendment to the amendment was before the committee, and could not be withdrawn without my consent.

But I wish to say that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee has no sort of operation or effect, because the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio has no reference to anything but the appropriations in this bill, and therefore it is idle to say that this amendment shall not go into effect until after one or two years; while the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is expressly limited to the appropriations in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. In accepting the modification of the gentleman from Tennessee, I modified that part of my amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. If these gentlemen would only take the pains to apply to any of the bureau officers, they will learn that there are amounts which cannot possibly be expended during the fiscal year for which they are appropriated. The reasons are obvious. Contracts have to be made. Public notices must be given, to invite proposals, and sometimes three months are consumed in their publication. Afterwards months more are consumed in the delivery of the articles, and you are really at the close of the year before you can use any of the articles for the purchase of which the appropriations are intended. And I would suggest to the gentleman that he might just as well provide that beef and pork should not be consumed, except during the fiscal year for which they are intended, as to say that the appropriation should not be used except during the fiscal year for which they were made. The law now supplies the limitation by providing that the amounts shall go to the surplus fund, after two years. And therefore I make the point of order on this amendment, for the purpose of getting rid of this discussion, that it is out of order because it proposes to change the existing law, which declares that these appropriations shall not return to the Treasury until after two years; whereas the operation and effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio is to alter the law, and to limit the term to one year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that he thinks the point of order comes too late. The amendment has been received by the committee, and has been debated on both sides.

Mr. MILLSON. The vote has not been taken upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest further to the gentleman that that point has already been decided in committee on similar amendments to former appropriation bills.

The question was taken on Mr. SHERMAN's amendment as modified, and it was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1845, "making appropriations for the naval service, for the year ending the 30th June, 1846," shall not be so construed as to include those papers which have the largest aggregate number of subscribers for a week, but it shall be construed to include those only having the largest list of permanent bona fide subscribers; and such publications as are required to be made weekly, shall be required to appear in the entire weekly editions of such papers respectively.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. The amendment is not germane to this bill. It is giving a construction to a law. I admit that if the amendment were confined to the restrictions of the appropriations contained in this bill for this year, it might be perhaps in order; but I understand that the amendment proposes to give a construction to other matters outside of the appropriations in this bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The amendment which I propose relates to some six different appropriations in the bill through which the committee has just passed. It relates to the construction of a law governing these appropriations, and thus alone it is strictly legitimate, and bearing upon the questions involved in this bill. There was no point at which I could offer it more than at any other, because it relates to appropriations in the State, War, Treasury, Interior, and all the other Departments, and the amendment was not in order at one point more than at any other. The amendment comes in properly here, not as changing an existing law, but as defining it, and as giving instructions on which the Departments have differed. It does not change it at all. I will hear the opinion of the Chair upon the point of order. I am perfectly certain that the amendment is not only in accordance with the ruling of the Chair on other occasions, but that there can be no point made against it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order already pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. But I want to present a different view of the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. HOUSTON. The effect of this amendment is precisely the same as enacting a new law. It proposes to construe the law by Congress in a way different from that in which it is construed by the law officers of the Government. The result is to change the law, and that being the case, in my view, it is out of order. A legislative construction is a substantial enactment of a new law. The construction given to this law by the officers whose duty it is to construe it, is different from the one which the gentleman now proposes to give; and his amendment is necessary, in his estimation, to change that construction, or, in other words, to change the law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. When we are through—

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Perhaps the gentleman desires to make another point of order, on the principle of the double-barreled gun—if one misses the other will kill. I hope the Chair will decide the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must say to the gentleman that the amendment proposes legislation, a change of the law, and is not in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois simply says that the Chair is mistaken on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Well, the Chair rules the amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURNETT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had directed him to report the same to the House, with sundry amendments.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Before the previous question is seconded, I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to make a modification in the amendment adopted in the committee, in regard to the extra pay of the reporters.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The House should either strike out the amendment to which the gentleman alludes, or alter its phraseology; and I will give way to him to put it in proper shape for the House to vote upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will, then, if there be no objection, strike out the words "present session of Congress," and insert, "next regular session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress."

There was no objection; and the amendment was modified accordingly.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

CLERICAL ERROR.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to ask the consent of the House to correct a clerical error of a very material character in the resolution in relation to the efficiency of the Navy, acted upon yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is in the Senate, but the gentleman can enter a motion to reconsider the vote of the House yesterday.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will do that, and I move that a message be sent to the Senate requesting them to return the resolution to correct an error.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the House that a clerical error occurred in the amendment to the resolution of the Senate with reference to the Naval board—1858 was inserted when it should have been 1859. The papers, as soon as they had been acted on, were sent to the Senate, and the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that a message be sent to the Senate, requesting that body to return the original papers.

Mr. FLORENCE's motion was agreed to.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the House referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bill to amend the laws granting land to soldiers and seamen, so as to include those engaged on board private armed vessels regularly commissioned by the United States.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask permission to have printed some evidence for the examination of that committee, preparatory to their report. The evidence is very voluminous. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to have printed, under the direction and for the use of the members of the said committee, the evidence in the case of Judge John C. Watrous, pending before said committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] whether those papers had any reference to the late election in Philadelphia? [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. Not officially.

And then, on motion of Mr. COMINS, (at thirteen minutes after five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 6, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. A. HARROLD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HAMMOND to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Finance, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. BRIGGS.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of Darcus Hall, praying to be allowed a pension and bounty land, as the widow of Simeon Reno, a sergeant in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GWIN presented a memorial of McKean Buchanan, a purser in the Navy, praying indemnity for losses occasioned by the illegal orders of his commanding officer; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of citizens of Butler county, Iowa, praying for the establishment of a mail route, with weekly service, from Cedar Falls, in Black Hawk county, via Willsborough, in Butler county, to Leoni, the county seat of Butler county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SIMMONS presented the petition of John R. Bartlett, praying for the payment of certain expenditures made by him as commissioner of the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STUART presented papers relating to the application of Thomas L. Disharoon to locate certain warrants on any of the public lands subject to private sale; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of business men of the northwestern lakes, praying that an appropriation may be made to ascertain whether Professor Ballot's rule by which the approach of storms may be foretold is applicable to the western lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of citizens of Malden, Massachusetts, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots of limited size for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of inhabitants of the town of Duxbury, Massachusetts, engaged and interested in the cod and haddock fisheries, on the coast of Massachusetts, praying that some provision may be made by law, so regulating the mode of taking those fish as to prevent the destruction of those fisheries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented a petition of the heirs and legal representatives of James Johnson, praying for the confirmation of their title to certain lands; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. KING. I wish to present a petition; and as it is very brief I will read it:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, business men of the northwestern lakes, respectfully sheweth to your honorable bodies that, by a recent scientific determination of Professor Ballot, of Holland, a numerical relation between the force of the wind and the difference of barometric pressure at the several points of observation has been discovered, by which the greatest force the wind will attain during the succeeding twelve, eighteen, or twenty-four hours, may be told in advance. Professor Ballot maintains that his rule has held good for five years in Holland, without a single failure.

Your petitioners further show that no system of meteorological observation has ever been applied to the great lakes by the General Government, and that were instruments furnished to the light-keepers at the principal commercial ports, observations of the proper kind could be economically carried on until the availability of the law in question, as to the lake winds, should be practically tested.

Your petitioners humbly pray your honorable bodies to appropriate $20,000 to purchase the requisite instruments, and to defray the telegraphic expenses between the points of observation and the National Observatory at Washington, in order to discover whether this valuable rule can be applied to lake navigation.

I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the message of the President of the United States in answer to a resolution of the Senate, concerning the outrages committed against the family of Mr. Dickson, an American citizen, residing at Jaffa, in Palestine, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a memorial of Douglas Ottinger, of the United States revenue service, praying for remuneration for the invention of an apparatus to rescue the lives of passengers in an open sea, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a petition of the president and stockholders of the Florida steam-packet company, asking compensation for the seizure and detention of the steamer Carolina by the collector of the port of Jacksonville, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of John Frink, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of S. Van Sickell, J. R. Bellerjeau, and George C. Leidy, for an increase of compensation as route agents, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 319) to enlarge the public grounds surrounding the Capitol; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 2) donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, have very carefully considered this question; and, in view of the circumstances existing in the committee, have directed me to report the bill back to the Senate without any recommendation for or against it, submitting it to the action of the Senate.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT BATH.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 307) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old custom-house and site in Bath, Maine, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask for the consideration of the bill now; it will not consume the time of the Senate, and it is desirable that the authority should be vested in the Secretary at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after the word "sell," to insert the words "at public auction, after first fixing a minimum price therefor;" so that the bill will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell at public auction, after first fixing a minimum price therefor, the old custom-house and site at Bath, Maine, when the new custom-house shall be completed and fit for occupation; and he is hereby authorized to use all or so much of the money arising from the sale of said old custom-house and site, as shall be necessary to furnish the new custom-house.

Mr. POLK. I would ask the Senator from Maine whether the bill makes no provision for advertising the sale before it takes place?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir, it does not; but I suppose it will be all under the direction of the Secretary, and I presume of course he would advertise it. It is to be sold at public auction after first fixing a minimum price. I do not think any such provision is necessary, but the Senator can offer an amendment to that effect, if he thinks it necessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the ordinary form.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. TOOMBS. I renew the motion which I made yesterday, that I be discharged from further service upon the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT put the question, and the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. TOOMBS. I call for a division.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope my friend from Georgia will reconsider his request. We can very illy spare him from that committee. He would be a very great loss to us. I do not know how his place could be very well supplied. Of course, if he insists on his motion I must, from courtesy, accede to it, but I should regret exceedingly if we were to lose his services on that committee. I hope he will withdraw his motion.

Mr. TOOMBS. I insist on my motion. I hope the Senate will accede to my request to be excused. The reason is personal entirely.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not press the motion. I concur in all that has been said by my friend from Louisiana. I should consider it a great loss to the committee. I do not know, myself, of any reason why the Senator should press the motion. I assure him that all his associates on the committee would be very loth to part with him.

Mr. TOOMBS. I insist on my motion.

Mr. MALLORY. I should dislike very much to see the Senator from Georgia relieved. There are a great many reasons which suggest themselves to me, and must to others, why we should desire him to continue on that committee. I shall vote for relieving him with a great deal of regret. I shall do so if he insists upon it, as a matter of course, for I should dislike to remain upon any committee on which I did not wish to serve, and I suppose we shall have to agree to the motion if he insists on it.

Mr. BAYARD. I regret exceedingly that the Senator from Georgia should have made this motion. Of course, in matters connected with the organization of committees I am always disposed, so far as my vote is concerned, where a member of the Senate desires to retire from a committee, to allow him to do so. Though I value the services of the Senator from Georgia very highly, and I think it would be a great loss to the committee if he were to withdraw from it, I shall not feel myself at liberty to oppose it if he insists upon the motion. At the same time, however, I shall regret it very much.

The motion was agreed to.

BRUNSWICK NAVAL DEPOT.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate what measures have been taken by the Department to execute the act of the 28th of January, 1857, "authorizing the establishment of a naval depot on Blythe Island, at Brunswick, Georgia;" what steps, if any, the Department proposes to adopt in the prosecution of said work; and at what time it is intended to commence and go on with the same; and the reasons why the commencement of the necessary works has not been made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POLK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 318) for the relief of Keep, Bard & Co., J. Caulfield, and Joseph Landis & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. POLK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Thomas L. Disharoon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk:

MR. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the House of Representatives to request the return from the Senate of the resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Secretary was directed to return the joint resolution to the House of Representatives.

A message was subsequently received from the House, announcing that the House had concurred in the Senate amendments to the joint resolution with an amendment.

RUFUS DWINEL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] the other day objected to a private bill that was taken up, and it was passed over. On examination, he authorizes me to say that he has examined the bill and report, and is satisfied that the claim is perfectly correct. I ask the Senate to take up the bill, and pass it now. I wish it sent to the other House at once. It is the bill (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel. The Senator from Louisiana found that he was in error as to his apprehension of the bill, and the report was perfectly satisfactory to him.

Mr. EVANS. What is it about?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is to give him a balance of an old claim; and it has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment of $11,748 03, being for interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, on the sum of $13,037 72, from the 4th day of March, 1837, when the latter sum was due from the United States to Dwinel's assignor, to March 11, 1852, when an appropriation was made for its payment.

Mr. CLAY. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; there is a report.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to hear it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can state in a few words what the case is.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator what my objection is. It has not been the policy or practice of the Government to pay interest, and I should object to it on that score. Interest is never allowed by the Government except as matter of compact or special legislation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will hear the case, I think he cannot have any objection at all. One Colonel Thomas, of whom Dwinel is the representative, was a contractor with the Post Office Department, and the Department commenced a suit against him, at his request, in order to settle his accounts. The jury, in their verdict, gave to him a certain sum of money, with interest. They did not include the amount of interest in the sum named in the verdict as due to him. The trial was here in this District. There was no dispute about the perfect fairness of it from the beginning to the end, or about the money due. Congress, a few years ago, appropriated an amount to pay the principal, but, under some misapprehension, did not pay the other part of the verdict, which was for the interest; and this is to give him the interest up to the time when he received the principal, according to the verdict rendered. It is a part of the verdict.

Mr. CLAY. I do not know how such a verdict could have been entered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The jury, instead of doing as they usually do—calculating the interest up to the time of the verdict—gave him the amount due up to a particular period, with interest to the time of the verdict, leaving the interest to be determined as a matter of calculation.

Mr. CLAY. Then I ask the Senator what the judgment was rendered for?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The judgment was rendered in that form, but no execution could be issued against the United States. If execution could have been issued, it would have been very easy for the clerk to calculate the amount. That is the ground of the claim. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEXAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Committee on Territories to whom was referred the House bill (H. R. No. 152) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the Territories of the United States and the State of Texas, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back with an amendment which I think renders the bill entirely unobjectionable. I ask that it be acted upon now. I do not think it will take a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Territories was, to insert at the end of the bill:

Provided, That the person or persons appointed or employed on the part and behalf of Texas are to be paid by said State: Provided further, That no person shall be appointed or employed in this service by the United States, but such as are required to make the necessary observations and surveys to ascertain such line, and to erect suitable monuments thereon and make return of the same.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The object of the bill is simply to provide for running so much of the boundary between the State of Texas and the territories of the United States as has not been heretofore run and established. The United States are to appoint persons on their part, and Texas on its part, Texas paying her own appointees. The last proviso is to cut off the back business. It provides that the officers are merely to run the boundary line and put up the monuments, not to make explorations of soil, and bring back bugs and plants and so on. That is all to be cut out. It is to be simply a naked boundary survey, and nothing else. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and that the bill will be passed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have not had the pleasure of seeing the amendment before, and I would suggest to the honorable Senator that I am anxious to look into the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I will ask that the bill be laid over for a day, that the Senator from Texas may consider it. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

SAN FRANCISCO POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRODERICK. I introduced, some two weeks since, a resolution of inquiry in regard to the San Francisco post office. I move that it be now taken up from the table and considered.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to furnish the Senate with a quarterly statement showing the aggregate amount collected at the post office at San Francisco over and above the lawful postage, for box rent from July 1, 1854, to December 31, 1857; and that he be requested to inform the Senate what law or what regulation of the Department authorizes the collection of the same, and also whether the postmaster has any legal authority to discriminate against one class of citizens and in favor of another class by withholding letters—as letters are withheld at the San Francisco post office—from those who will not submit to the exaction for box rent, until at least an hour after letters are delivered to those who do thus submit to the exaction.

Mr. BIGLER. I certainly do not intend to object to the passage of a resolution of inquiry; but I suggest to the Senator from California that this resolution asserts as a fact what may not exist at all. We call on the Postmaster General to communicate to the Senate the amount of receipts which have been illegally received at the San Francisco post office. Now, I suggest that the resolution ought to call for information as to the fact whether illegal fees have been received for the use of the boxes; and if so, to what extent. I do not like to vote for a resolution which asserts as a fact that which the Senate does not know to be so.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am very well satisfied that illegal fees have been collected; but I have no objection to striking out that portion of the resolution, and modifying it so that we can get the information.

Mr. YULEE. I will make a distinct motion. It was my intention to do so, as I informed the Senator from California. The first branch of the resolution proposes to inquire what amount of box rents were received at the San Francisco post office between the 1st of July, 1854, and the 31st of December, 1857. There can be no objection to that inquiry, if it is deemed desirable by the Senator, though the information can be furnished to him without a call from this body on the Department. The resolution then continues:

"And that he be requested to inform the Senate what law or what regulation of the Department authorizes the collection of the same."

We know what law there is, and it is our duty as legislators to know what the law is on the subject. I can inform the gentleman—

Mr. BRODERICK. I would rather get the information from the Department than from the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YULEE. The Department have once or twice reported on that subject. That will not be material, if the Senator desires to hear from them, though the law is before us. All the rest of the resolution I will move to strike out, and I make that distinct proposition. The words to be stricken out are:

"And also whether the postmaster has any legal authority to discriminate against one class of citizens, and in favor of another class, by withholding letters—as letters are withheld at the San Francisco post office—from those who will not submit to the exaction for box rent, until at least an hour after letters are delivered to those who do thus submit to the exaction."

Now, I take it, it is both becoming and proper in the intercourse between the different Departments of the Government, that we should practice courtesy; and I think that is a very discourteous inquiry, pregnant with a very unjust imputation, and especially as I can assure the Senator that no such occurrence has taken place in California. I think the Senator has received a letter very recently which ought to satisfy him on that point. However, I think the Senate ought not to stultify itself by asking such a question as whether a postmaster has legal authority to discriminate between one class of citizens and another. We know certainly that he has not; and such an inquiry, it seems to me, is very unnecessary to be made of one of the Executive Departments, and very discourteous.

The Senator assumes in the resolution, as has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, as a fact, what the Senate cannot know to exist as a fact, and what I am sure does not exist as a fact. If the Senator desired to make the inquiry as to any particular case, then it might be proper to call on the Executive for information. If the Senator knew of any case in which there has been a malfeasance by the postmaster at San Francisco, as is implied here, then it might be proper for him to introduce a resolution, calling on the Department for the facts in reference to that particular case. If he knows of the existence of such a fact, it is his duty to communicate it to the Department; and if the Department fail to act on his information, then to pursue whatever other course may be proper to bring the offending officer to judgment, either on the part of the Executive or the Legislature, if legislative interference should be necessary. But I take it, sir, that the Senator should, if he believes there has been malfeasance on the part of the postmaster at San Francisco, specify what it is, and call for the specific information on that particular case; otherwise we require the Postmaster General, by a sort of drag-net resolution, to float about in search of some cause of complaint against the postmaster at San Francisco, when he is not in possession of any fact of complaint, or any fact of malfeasance on the part of the postmaster there. I move, therefore, to strike out the whole of the latter clause as entirely unnecessary; and if the Senator chooses to introduce an additional clause here, specifying some particular case of complaint, and calling upon the Department for such information as its records may furnish in regard to that particular cause of complaint, I should have no objection; but I do object to the form in which it is put here, as stultifying the Senate and discourteous to a branch of the Government which we unite in administering.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggested an amendment.

Mr. BRODERICK. I accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must ask the Senator to put it in writing, for he does not know how to have it recorded.

Mr. BIGLER. The amendment I suggested was, that instead of asserting a fact, the inquiry should be into the fact. I will see the resolution in a moment, and ascertain at what point it should come in.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Secretary read the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is, after the words "1857," in line six, to insert, "and whether any amount has been collected above the lawful postage."

Mr. YULEE. And strike out all the rest of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Florida being to strike out and insert, the resolution must first be perfected.

Mr. BRODERICK. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but I am at a loss to know why the Senator from Florida objects to the call for this information that I request the Postmaster General to give the Senate. I am well satisfied that this postmaster has been guilty of malfeasance in office. I am satisfied of it, sir, because a gentleman who formerly occupied a position in the post office at San Francisco made an affidavit, some three months since, specifying the acts of misconduct. I handed that affidavit to my colleague, and I believe he put it on file in the Post Office Department; but instead of the Postmaster General taking any notice of it, he inclosed it to the postmaster at San Francisco; and the first information I had of it, was when I received my correspondence a day or two since, and learned that the postmaster at San Francisco had denied the charges alleged against him. I have thought that it was the duty of the Postmaster General, when a serious charge was made against one of his officers, not to inform the officer of the charge before he ascertained whether there was any truth in it or not. This charge was, that he had collected money on French letters, which he was not entitled to collect; and instead of making any return of it to the Government, put the money into his pocket. The man who made the charge is reputed in California to be a gentleman, and I do not think he would make an affidavit to a falsehood.

Now, sir, if the Senator from Florida wants the proof, I think I can give it to him. I have not got it in my possession to-day, but I will allow the resolution to go over until to-morrow, and I think I shall be able to satisfy the Senator from Florida, that this postmaster has been guilty of misconduct and malfeasance in office; but the Postmaster General, and several other gentlemen about Washington, have been trying, in my opinion, to screen him. If there is any information in the Post Office Department in regard to his conduct in office, I should like the Senate to have it. I am not in communication with the Post Office Department. I have never entered any door of the building since I have occupied a seat on this floor, and I hope I never shall do so, while the present occupant is in possession of the building.

I will not urge the resolution to-day; I want to convince the Senator from Florida, as he appears to be satisfied that there is no charge against this officer, that there are serious charges on file in the Post Office Department against him. I have a copy of them at my room, which I will bring to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to postpone the subject until to-morrow?

Mr. BRODERICK. I do.

Mr. YULEE. I will say a word in reply to the Senator from California before that motion is put. The Senator from California brings up a charge against the postmaster at San Francisco, to which his resolution has no reference whatever, and concerning which his resolution will call out no information at all. I cannot, therefore, help thinking that the Senator has been somewhat careless in the preparation of his resolution, and would recommend him to revise it.

Mr. BRODERICK. When I introduced it I had not the last information in my possession.

Mr. YULEE. If the Senator will look to his resolution, he will see that the resolution will call out no information on the point to which he refers. Now, as he has thought proper to bring up that charge before the Senate against the postmaster at San Francisco, who is known to us as a brother of a former associate here, and who is an officer of standing and deserving to be defended when he is not known to have been a malfeasor in his office, it is proper for me to say, both in vindication of the Post Office Department and of the postmaster at San Francisco, that the charge referred to by the Senator from California, and which he says was filed in the form of an affidavit, was filed with the Postmaster General—an affidavit of Mr. Folger, I believe; and the Postmaster General did, as he does in every other case of charge against an officer, and as it is his imperative duty to do before he can proceed further to punish the officer, or to institute proceedings against him, forward a copy of the charge made against the officer in California, and call upon him for an explanation and answer. That call was made immediately upon the receipt of the charge. The answer was made by return of mail, by the first vessel which returned after the charge had been received in San Francisco, and the copy of his explanation was communicated to the Senator from California. Now, if he proposes any further action, this is not the tribunal. In a very short time, when he is called to act upon the nomination of the postmaster of San Francisco, there will be an opportunity for him to bring forward his charges, and take action upon them in the Senate, so far as the Senate is concerned. Beyond that, I do not see how the Senate can interfere. But, sir, the amendment which the Senator from Pennsylvania has proposed to this resolution will not remove the objection—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will take the liberty of reminding the Senator that the motion before the Senate is one simply to postpone the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. YULEE. Very well.

Mr. BRODERICK. I should like to say a word, since the gentleman has made a speech.

When I introduced the resolution now under consideration, I had not the information from the Post Office Department to which the Senator refers; and I do not want, at this time, to make any use of it. As the Senator from Florida stated that the information I wanted to get from the Post Office Department could be of no use to the Senate or to myself, I thought he was of the opinion that this officer had committed no misconduct in office, and I wanted to remind the Senate that he had—at least that I thought he had. I shall be prepared, when the name of this officer is sent in for confirmation, to prove that he has been guilty of very bad conduct in office.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

FRAUDS UPON THE REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. In December last, I gave notice that I should ask leave to introduce a bill to prevent the continuance of frauds upon the revenue. I gave this notice during the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] which was then laid over. I now ask leave to introduce the bill, and I desire to have it printed for the consideration of the Senate, and I should like to have some early day in next week assigned for the consideration of that resolution. If it be in order, I should like to have it assigned for Monday next, when I will call it up and explain the provisions of the bill.

Leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 320) to prevent the continuance of fraud upon the revenue, by the under valuation of foreign imports; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move that the bill be printed for the information of the Senate; and I should like to have the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, which has two branches to it, one providing for a system of home valuation, and the other for increasing the revenue, assigned for a day when I may explain the object of the bill.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Has the bill been sent to any committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir; but I have had a consultation with the Committee on Finance, and they would like to have it printed and considered without being sent to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand what resolution the Senator refers to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, in December last, which was laid on the table temporarily.

Mr. CLAY. The hour has arrived for the special order, and I hope we shall proceed with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us assign this bill for Monday.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator, in the mean time, can look up the resolution and have it found.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has been found; but the time has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I should be glad to correct an error in a statement of mine, made the day before yesterday. I stated, in the course of the debate on the printing bill, on Tuesday last—

“Why, sir, there is a single item of public printing, which has been in the course of prosecution for the last fifteen years, and is not yet completed, and there is not now, that we are aware of, a solitary entire copy of the work in existence. Thirty volumes have already been printed, and it is not yet complete. I have inquired in our public library, and I cannot find a complete copy of it.”

There is an error in that statement, as I am now informed there are a number of complete copies. Some of the copies are incomplete, in consequence of fire having destroyed them, but I believe the number of that class is only about twenty. There are a good number of complete copies. I inquired at the congressional library, some months since, and was then told that there was no complete copy in the congressional library, as I understood; but I am now informed that there are complete copies of the work in the congressional library. I wish to make this correction, and to say, that the work has extended to thirty-six volumes, thus far. I allude to Wilkes's exploring expedition. I will also call attention to the fact that I said on that occasion—

“These matters seem to be got up to gratify the personal pride and personal ease of officers who engage in expeditions and surveys, rather than for any other purpose.”

That was rather a personal expression, perhaps; and I believe was wrong. I do not think I should use it in that way. They are not got up for this purpose. In the first place, they are got up for some great public and useful purpose; but in general debate here, we sometimes, perhaps, unwittingly make remarks that have a tendency to assail gentlemen. My attention has been called to this; and I do not like to do any injustice. I do not wish to make that charge; and I do not. I do not believe these expeditions are got up for the personal ease and comfort and honor of the officers under whom they are conducted; and, in giving utterance to that expression in the first instance, I went, in the latitude of debate, perhaps a little too far.

ADMISSION OF OREGON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the bill for the admission of Oregon into the Union, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY. That is not the special order for to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; it is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CLAY. But when the hour arrives which is assigned for the special order, as I understand, according to the rules of the Senate you must proceed with that. That is my understanding; but I may be in error.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of the day before stands at the head of all the special orders, and becomes the first order for the next day.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] desires to proceed to-day, and I move to postpone the Oregon bill until to-morrow at one o'clock, so that we may go on with the fishing bounties bill.

Mr. CLAY. Move the postponement without naming any particular hour.

Mr. HUNTER. I make the simple motion to postpone.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator from Maine came in to-day for the purpose of making a speech, and desires to do so, I shall feel bound to yield; but I can only do so on the condition that the Oregon bill be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and made the special order for that time, so that it may not lose its priority.

Mr. HUNTER. To-morrow is private bill day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If it is postponed to enable the Senator from Maine to make a speech, with the understanding that it does not lose its priority, I shall not object; but I do not feel at liberty to consent that it shall lose its priority and go behind all the other special orders.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It must go behind all before it, if it be postponed.

Mr. STUART. I suppose, if the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama is taken, that the bill be merely postponed, it may come up again to-day. The Senator from Maine may get through with his remarks in time for that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is merely postponed now for the purpose of enabling the Senate to take up the other bill, it will come up next.

Mr. HUNTER. I so modify my motion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. With that explanation, I have no objection to it.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, the relations which the fisheries have borne in every country to the commercial and naval prosperity of that country, I think, are intimate and important. They are measured by no narrow vision; they are circumscribed by no local position; and I think if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] had risen above the mere locality of the fisheries, and had proceeded to make an investigation of the subject upon a broader principle, he might have come to a different conclusion—at least he might have divested himself of that bitterness which was witnessed in the sneer upon his face, if not in the language which he uttered when he said that the taking of cod was a momentous concern. The mere act of taking cod may be objectionable, if the Senator pleases, to that sneer; but when measured by other considerations that justly and properly belong to it, and when viewed in an enlightened sense—in that sense which belongs to an American statesman and to an American Senator—it is worthy of anything else but the sneer of any Senator. The fisheries are local. The Ruler of the world has made them so. The waters of the far North are the fields in which the fish are taken, and it would be natural to suppose that the people residing near to those fields are employed in that pursuit. Though they are local, they are, nevertheless, in their importance, national. So the fields in which the sugar-cane is cultivated are peculiar to that State which is represented by the Senator who sits beside me, [Mr. BENJAMIN;] and I affirm here to-day that while you pay a bounty to the fishermen, for national purposes, as I shall endeavor to establish, you pay a bounty, by your system of revenue laws, to the planters and growers of sugar-cane in Louisiana. You may say that the one is based upon revenue, and for revenue purposes. My answer is, that the other is for a purpose as national, and as broad; and that is, of training seamen for the naval service.

In every country which has existed from the formation of the world to the present time, the relations between the fisheries and the commerce and the naval power of the country have been intimate and direct. Indeed, sir, there is no country on the face of the globe that has been marked and distinguished for its naval or its commercial supremacy, that has not had a corps of fishermen from which to support both of these institutions. From the days of Scripture times, from the day when Sidon was founded, which was the city of fish, down to the present moment, there has been no nation that has not relied for its commercial and its naval prosperity upon its fisheries as nurseries for seamen, to supply both its commerce and its navy. It is not my purpose now to follow, in detail, the positions which have been advocated by the Senator from Alabama, though, in the line of argument which I propose, I think I shall very fully meet the suggestions which he has made. One position, however, which that Senator has assumed requires a direct answer and investigation, and it is as to the nature and origin of these bounties. The Senator has followed precisely the line of argument laid down in the report made by Mr. Benton in the Senate in 1846. Mr. Benton elaborated the points, as the Senator from Alabama has done, in an argument. The Senator has told us that these bounties originally were designed as a drawback for the duties imposed upon the salt consumed in the fisheries. Well, sir, I am not disposed to deny that in the early history of this matter, the amount of duty imposed upon salt had a controlling influence upon many minds; nor am I now disposed to deny that the relief, the protection, the aid, the bounty—call it by whatever name you may please—that was granted by the Government, had, at that time, a relative connection with the duty imposed upon salt. It is true; I do not deny it; but still I affirm that it was, nevertheless, just as much a relief to the fisherman as though it had been a bounty conferred upon him in another form, and in another manner. What did it matter to him whether the money which he received for following his avocation was received in direct terms from the Treasury, or whether it was drawn from the Treasury as a drawback for the duty on the salt which he had used? To him it was precisely the same.

But, sir, that that is the policy to-day, that it was finally the policy which the Government in its wisdom adopted, I deny; and I disagree with the Senator from Alabama when he draws the conclusion that the system which exists to-day has any connection with the duties or drawbacks upon salt. The last law on the subject, which was passed in 1813, gave a bounty in words, and it fixed it upon the tonnage of the vessel, and that bounty was regulated according to the size of the vessel. It is true that in the same bill a duty of twenty cents a bushel was imposed upon salt; but the fair interpretation of that act is, that it gave precisely what was asked. It was a departure from the old rule of making the allowance to the fishermen depend upon the amount of the duty upon salt. Besides, that same bill also allowed a drawback, giving to the fishermen a drawback and a bounty. That bill, by its terms, I say, proves clearly an intention to depart from the system which had marked the earlier period of the Government, when they did what they supposed was sufficient for the protection of the fishermen. The terms of that bill are conclusive that Congress designed to depart from the earlier policy of the bill, and to allow a certain bounty, on which the fishermen might rely. Did Congress, then, provide, as they did in any other bills, that the amount the fishermen should receive should depend upon the amount of salt used? Did they provide that the fishermen should use any quantity of salt? No, sir. Did they provide that the sum which the fishermen should receive should be held in the Treasury until it was ascertained what amount of salt they used? No, sir; and yet these are all provisions which are contained in previous laws. By this law, the bounty is no way made dependent or contingent on the amount of salt they might use, or the duty which may have been then, or which might thereafter, be imposed upon salt. By this law the bounty was made payable, three eighths to the owner of the vessel, and five eighths to the crew. The law of 1819 only increased the amount of the bounty, and is the law under which they are now paid.

But, sir, whatever may have been the view of certain men in relation to allowing a drawback as an equivalent to the fishermen in an earlier day, I answer that it was only the opinion of those men who expressed it; and for other, and for better and for higher reasons, members may have voted for that system who did not agree with the reasons which were given by those who might have voted for it for other purposes. The last law fixes and determines a rate of bounty—an obnoxious word to the Senator from Alabama, and an obnoxious word to myself; for, as a general system, I agree fully with him, that it is not the policy of the Government to pay a direct bounty upon any branch of industry. If, however, there are peculiar reasons which make any class of the industry of the country deserving of special protection—if there are any reasons why bounties, either direct or indirect, ought to be granted for special purposes—I am ready to examine that question outside of the general rule which the Senator lays down, and in which I agree with him.

So much for the general proposition of the Senator from Alabama that these bounties had their origin in a drawback, and that it was designed by Congress to aid the fisheries only to the extent of the amount of the duty upon salt which was imposed upon them. I say that when the acts of 1813 and 1819 were passed it was the design of the Government to foster this branch of industry for the purpose of raising a corps of seamen who should always be found ready to participate in your commercial and in your naval marine, without which the prosperity of no country can be advanced; and whatever advances the prosperity of the country in commerce applies as well to Alabama as to Maine. You might as well say that we have no national interest in the gold-fields of California, because they are confined to that State; you might as well say that they are not national in their importance, as to say that the fisheries, because they are in the eastern States and beyond the eastern States, are not national, on account of having that particular location. Sir, they are national, and it is to that point that I invite the attention of the Senate. I propose to take a broader view of the importance of this question than that which has been given to it by the Senator from Alabama; and I think I can show conclusively that, though local in fact, they are national in their importance, and they address themselves to every section of the Union, and every locality where commerce and naval power has an interest, as strongly and as directly as to the people who reside in their immediate vicinity.

Whatever may be the views of the Senate—whatever may be the fate of the bill now pending, it is hardly sufficient to sneer it out of importance by limiting it to the mere catching of fish. To show what has been the regard with which these fisheries have always been treated, from the formation of the Government up to the present time—ay, sir, and before the formation of this Government—it will be my purpose to go as briefly as I may into their history. I design to show their importance to-day, and I hold that their importance to-day is equal to that which was attached to them more than seventy-five years ago.

The question of the fisheries on the northeastern coast was an important question with these States when they were colonies. Our right to them was a point which was mixed up with, and formed the basis of, the revolutionary struggle. They were treated by our revolutionary fathers as of vital importance. They were so regarded in the war of 1812, because they were considered then, as they are to-day, as the nurseries of seamen, and seamen can nowhere else be as well educated. I speak of American seamen; because I shall have occasion, before I close, to speak of the seamen that man your commercial marine and your naval service to-day. They are made up of foreigners. No wise statesman, no man who has regard for the interest of his whole country, I think, will desire to see either the commercial or the naval power of this country placed in the hands of unnaturalized foreigners. These interests are too dear to us all, too broad, too comprehensive, and too important, to be trusted to any other hands than those of American-born citizens, or at least of naturalized citizens.

Now, sir, we must not forget the importance of this question because the fisheries themselves happen to be local. They are outside the limits of our own country mainly; they are not as accessible to us even as they are to our neighbors in the British provinces; but they are more accessible to the people of the eastern States than to those of any other portion of the Union. I have said that the question of these fisheries entered into, and formed a vital element of, the revolutionary war itself. The history of the times is full of it. More than that, the importance of these fisheries, in a commercial and a naval point of view, entered into the contests between France and England for a long period of time anterior to the Declaration of Independence. They were the subjects of strife and war between those Powers for more than a hundred years; and for what purpose? As the school of seamen. Many of the contests which took place between the Governments of France and Great Britain in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, turned directly upon the value and importance of the possession of these fisheries. Let me refer very briefly to their history.

By the treaty of St Germain's, in 1632, Nova Scotia was given to France; twenty-two years afterwards it was taken possession of by Cromwell. By the treaty of Baden, in 1667, after the restoration of the Stuarts, it was again secured to France. In the war between France and England, following the accession of William and Mary, Sir William Phipps, born in Maine, reduced Nova Scotia, and established an English government. By the treaty of Ryswick, in 1697, it was again restored to France. In the first year of the reign of Queen Anne, France and England were again at war, and the rights to the fishing grounds and a part of the territory of Maine were amongst the principal causes. Under the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, it became an English province. This was effected mainly by New England fishermen. By the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, Cape Breton was restored to France. In the war of 1756, commonly called the seven years' war, England became possessed of Canada and all the French possessions. The Gaul resigned the mastery in the New World to the Briton.

During all these wars and negotiations, it is of great moment to see how these fisheries were regarded by each party, and the intimate connection and importance they bore to the naval power of each Government. It can all be seen by any one who will examine the negotiations of the times. In the negotiations in 1763, between France and England, it was said in London "that the fisheries were worth more than all Canada."

I have thus very hastily alluded to the early history of these fisheries to show how important they were regarded by those Governments. They are as important, to-day, to us, as they were to France and England at the period of time to which I have alluded. Subsequent to that period, and anterior to the revolutionary war, they were treated by the colonies and by the mother Government precisely in the same light. Indeed, Mr. Otis remarked, and well remarked, in 1808, when a member of the other House of Congress, that these fisheries formed one of the main and principal causes of the revolutionary war. Any man who will examine the history of the times, any man who will examine the negotiations and what was said in relation to these fisheries at that period of time, can have no doubt as to the accuracy of Mr. Otis's statement.

I think it is shown very conclusively in documents which were printed at that period of time, that the British Government regarded these fisheries as of the greatest importance, and that they were, in truth and in fact, one of the principal causes of the war which led to the separation of the two Governments. Sir Josiah Childs, an English writer of high authority, used the following significant language at a very early day—within fifty years after the Puritans had landed at Plymouth:

"New England is the most prejudicial plantation to this kingdom, because, of all the American plantations, his Majesty has none so apt for building of shipping as New England, nor any comparably so qualified for the breeding of seamen, not only by reason of the natural industry of that people, but principally by reason of their cod and mackerel fisheries; and, in my opinion, there is nothing more prejudicial, and in prospect more dangerous, to any mother kingdom, than the increase of shipping in her colonies, plantations, or provinces."

That declaration of Sir Josiah Childs was followed up directly by the action of the British Parliament. They attempted to impose, and did impose upon the colonies, restrictions upon their commerce and fisheries which were onerous, and which contributed as much as, or more than, any other cause, to bring about the separation and the independence of the colonies. In 1733 a law was passed by the British Government imposing a duty upon rum, molasses, and sugar imported into the colonies from any of the West India islands, except in British bottoms. The penalty was the forfeit of the vessel. In 1764 this act was renewed, and admiralty jurisdiction was increased, and a trial by jury was denied. In 1775, February 10, Lord North introduced a bill, which became a law, "to restrain the trade and commerce of the provinces of Massachusetts Bay and New Hampshire, the colonies of Connecticut and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in North America, with Great Britain and Ireland and the British islands in the West Indies, and to prohibit such colonies and provinces from carrying on the fishery on the banks of Newfoundland and other places therein mentioned, under certain conditions, and for a time to be limited." Certain persons who would not acknowledge the right of Parliament were to be excluded in the certificate of the Governor of good behavior, which, I suppose, was equivalent to loyalty to the Crown. This act was designed to starve the fishermen into submission. How it failed we shall see when we come to examine what these men did in the revolutionary war.

It was the policy of the mother Government to prohibit trade in other than in British bottoms between the colonies and her own ports; and subsequently absolutely to annihilate the colonial trade, for the reason that had been laid down by Sir Josiah Childs, that the colonies were dangerous, for they were increasing in seamen, and were promoting commerce.

This is the early history of these fisheries. It shows the importance which had been attached to them by both France and England while they were in controversy between the two Governments. It shows the importance attached to them by the British Government while we were colonies. It shows that they were one of the great causes which led to the revolutionary war. All this was because their possession would increase the commercial and naval power of the country owning them.

I now proceed to the consideration of another point, to show how important our Government considered them in the negotiations for peace at the close of the revolutionary war. It regarded them as of vital importance. They were made an ultimatum of peace. In September, 1779, the following instructions were forwarded to Mr. Adams from the Colonial Congress:

"That the common right of fishing should in no case be given up.

"That it is essential to the welfare of all the United States, that the inhabitants thereof, at the expiration of the war, should continue to enjoy the free and undisturbed exercise of their common right to fish on the banks of Newfoundland, and all the other fishing banks and seas of North America, preserving inviolate the treaties between France and the United States."

Sir, when these resolutions were under consideration in the Colonial Congress, on motion of Mr. Dickinson, of Delaware, the word "all" was inserted before "the United States," for he insisted, like a patriotic man, and like a statesman who took an elevated view of the question, that whatever interested a locality, and was of national importance, interested all. On his motion, by a vote of ten States to two, the word "all" was inserted. These instructions continue:

"That our faith be pledged to the several States, that without their unanimous consent no treaty of commerce shall be entered into, nor any trade or commerce whatever carried on with Great Britain, without the express stipulation hereinafter mentioned. You are, therefore, not to consent to any treaty of commerce with Great Britain, without an express stipulation on her part not to molest or disturb the inhabitants of the United States of America in taking fish on the banks of Newfoundland, or other fisheries in American seas, anywhere, except within the distance of three leagues of the shores of the territories remaining to Great Britain at the close of the war, if a nearer distance cannot be obtained by negotiation."

Admiralty jurisdiction went to that extent; but outside of what was within the admiralty jurisdiction of the colonies, our ministers were instructed by Congress, even in those dark and trying times, not to negotiate a peace that did not secure to the American people all the rights which they had enjoyed before in these fisheries; and for what purpose? The mere catching of cod? No, sir; but of educating seamen in the best school that ever existed; seamen for commercial and for naval purposes; seamen that have elevated every people who have had them; seamen that have made England what she is; seamen that were known in the days of Venice as the élite; seamen that gave to her all the commercial renown she ever possessed; seamen that have given to every Power on earth its commercial and its naval distinction.

I know very well, Mr. President, that this question does not bear directly upon the mere paltry sum of a few hundred thousand dollars that you contribute to these men. I will come to that, however. But I am citing these authorities to show the national importance of these fisheries; to show how they have been treated by other men—men who understood their value quite as fully as we understand it; by men who instructed their plenipotentiaries in the dark days of the Revolution that no peace should be negotiated without securing to our people the rights they held in these fisheries—rights that were intimately connected with all the broad land.

But further, sir: during the negotiations, the value and importance of these fisheries was the subject of earnest and able discussion in England. It was said, with other things, that "a nursery of seamen so excellent and so necessary for the support of her naval force will never be given up or divided by America with any Power whatsoever." Lord North, when he introduced the very bill to which I have alluded, to deprive the fishermen of their rights, said, in the House of Commons, in 1775:

"While they extended British commerce, and kept open a continual advantageous intercourse with foreign nations, they increased the naval strength of the kingdom, and were consequently the great source of that power which gave it the preëminence over all other nations of Europe."

Our ministers were instructed not to negotiate a treaty without the consent of France, who had been our ally; but this instruction was violated because of the delay that was interposed, and because Mr. Adams became satisfied that the French were conspiring with the English to deprive us of our rights to the fisheries. In 1782, the letter of Barbe de Marbois, the French chargé d'affaires to the United States, to Count de Vergennes, the principal Minister of State, was intercepted. The scope of the letter was to secure the fisheries to France. The treaty was concluded, and the third article declares—

"That the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy, unmolested, the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish."

Thus was secured what was deemed of so much importance in those days—a right commensurate with all the States, and so vital to commerce and naval power.

I have read Lord North's statement as to the value of the fisheries; and yet the Senator from Alabama tells us that Holland and England and France have never found these schools contribute to their naval power. I do not quote his language, but I give the substance of what he said. He declared that the bounty they had bestowed for the purpose of creating and establishing these schools had signally failed. Sir, the history of their own statesmen is different. The history of the French statesmen to which I shall refer you by and by is different.

Mr. CLAY Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. He misapprehended the import of my language, or what I intended to say. I intended to say that the bounties bestowed by the English and French Governments upon the herring or mackerel or whale fisheries, had not redounded to the advantage of those fisheries; but that, on the contrary, we had competed successfully with them, and outstripped them without the aid of such bounties.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will come to that point; and I think I shall satisfy the Senator, if he is not prejudiced on the matter, if he will take the testimony of their own statesmen, that they have been most eminently successful.

Mr. CLAY. I will remark to the Senator that I referred to figures and facts, and not to the opinions of statesmen. The figures cannot misrepresent the truth.

Mr. HAMLIN. I design to refer to both. But, sir, not only was such importance attached to these fisheries, in a national point of view, by those who participated in the revolutionary war, but when we engaged in war with Great Britain in 1812, they became again the subject of controversy, and it was upon the question of the rights of the Americans to enjoy what they had theretofore enjoyed in the fisheries that negotiations turned. They were treated by our Government as of the same importance then that they had been treated by the French and the English, and by the English and our own Government, in the revolutionary war. They were, if I may use the expression, made more than an ultimatum, and it was upon this that negotiations finally closed. Our ministers at Ghent, consisting of Messrs. Adams, Clay, Gallatin, Bayard, and Russell, were instructed in words that leave no doubt about what was the intention of the Government. They were told:

"These rights must not be brought into discussion."

That was going a great way. Our rights to the fisheries were not even to be brought into discussion. They were so plain, so palpable, so important, in a national point of view, that our ministers were not even allowed to bring them into discussion.

"If they are, your negotiations will cease."

That is explicit. Every man knows what was the state of our commerce growing out of the war of 1812. Any war with Great Britain must necessarily lead to its prostration; but notwithstanding its depressed condition, these emphatic and explicit directions were issued to our commissioners at Ghent, that even a discussion of the rights of our fishermen was not to be allowed; and if insisted upon, negotiations were to cease. Of the course pursued by the British plenipotentiaries, Mr. Adams said:

"Their efforts to obtain our acquiescence in their pretension that the fishing liberties had been forfeited by war, were unwearied. They presented it to us in every form that ingenuity could devise. It was the first stumbling-block and the last obstacle to the conclusion of the treaty."

And in November, 1814, that noble old man, who will live in history forever, and who will be loved while any man shall live who loves liberty—John Adams, from his retirement at Quincy, volunteered this letter to the President:

"All I can say is, that I would continue this war forever rather than surrender one acre of our territory, or one iota of the fisheries, as established by the third article of the treaty of 1782."

Thus, sir, may be seen the importance with which our fathers, before the revolutionary war, during the revolutionary war, and subsequent to the revolutionary war, regarded the fisheries; and I think it is too late to sneer it out of Congress. They are as important to-day as they were then.

I know that they do not bear the same relative proportion either to the commerce or the naval power of the country that they then bore; but I think the conclusion from this fact is precisely opposite to that which has been drawn by the Senator from Alabama. Your fisheries cover a certain field; they are limited, and they cannot be extended beyond a certain point. The general commerce of your country is broad, and may be almost illimitable. Because they do not bear the same relation to the commerce of the country that they then bore, I insist it is an argument why they ought to be still more fostered. If they constituted, in the early history of the country, a great proportion of your seamen, they were better able to take care of themselves. If they are now only a small proportion, the greater is the necessity for a school from which your seamen to supply your commerce are to be contributed, because that field is no larger, while your commercial field is still broader. So it is in relation to naval power.

But, sir, I want to show you what was the part which these fishermen bore, not only in the revolutionary war, but in the war of 1812. I invite your attention to the very important part which they contributed, and I think no class contributed more—I had almost said that all other classes had not contributed as much to produce that happy result which was produced in either case as these fishermen who happened to reside in a locality. If you can educate seamen cheaper in any other way, I am for abolishing the fishing bounties. I am for sustaining these fishing bounties only upon the ground that it is the cheapest mode by which you can educate men upon whom you must rely in the emergency of war. Can you do it cheaper in any other way? Then do it. I am not advocating bounties to any class of citizens, be they who they may, unless it be of national importance, for a national purpose, and be the most economical mode of effecting the object. I believe that the contribution of two or three hundred thousand dollars a year—the average is about two hundred and five thousand dollars—will continuously keep in reserve a vast corps of seamen upon whom you can rely in time of war better than any other class of men—a class upon whom you must call in that emergency. If, however, there is any alternative proposition—if there is any other way in which seamen can be more cheaply and economically furnished to your Navy, then I am not in favor of this. I am not in favor of bounties, I am only in favor of them in this case because there is a necessity for them, from the nature of the business which requires aid to keep it alive; and to keep it alive is the only way in which you can get the force that is requisite and necessary.

Now, I come to the important part which this corps of fishermen bore in the struggle of the revolutionary war. They were few in number then, compared to what they are now, but they were important. There was no branch of the service that did more honorable and gallant service than they. There was no part of the service that aided more in bringing about the happy negotiations which ended in peace, and in our independence. It is recorded in the history of the times, and of it there can be no serious question, that more than fifty thousand tons of British shipping were captured in 1777, by these New England fishermen. Curwin, of Salem, a Loyalist, who fled to England, states in his journal that from May 1776 to February 1778, Lloyd's Coffee-house list shows that American privateers, one hundred and seventy-three in number, captured seven hundred and thirty-three British vessels, with their cargoes, worth more than twenty-five million dollars; and they counted millions of dollars by a higher standard in that day than we do now. Other authorities, entitled to confidence, show that during the war full two hundred thousand tons of shipping were taken by rebel privateers. We had no Navy. In all the naval service of the revolutionary war, we had to depend mainly upon the privateer service that was composed almost exclusively of the fishermen. So efficient were they, that underwriters demanded, and there were paid, premiums of from thirty to fifty per cent. The mercantile interest of England clamored for peace. The fishermen were abroad upon every water; and the lagoons of the Mediterranean never swarmed with men more efficiently engaged in catching fish, than did the privateersmen of New England swarm the ocean in capturing British vessels, in the war of the Revolution.

I wish to read an authority in relation to their services in the revolutionary war, and it is the authority of that old patriot and statesman, Henry Knox, who shared with Washington so much of the glories and suffered so many of the hardships of the war. He speaks with a feeling heart of the services of these men in that day. Knox, himself a member of the Massachusetts Legislature long after peace had been declared, in speaking of these fishermen gives them not only that proud position to which they were entitled upon the ocean, but, if possible, still higher credit for the services they had performed upon the land. In speaking of the time when Washington was obliged to cross the Delaware on his bridge of boats, he said:

"Sir, I wish the members of this body knew the people of Marblehead as well as I do. I could wish that they had stood on the banks of the Delaware river in 1777, in that bitter night when the commander-in-chief had drawn up his little army to cross it, and had seen the powerful current bearing onward the floating masses of ice which threatened destruction to whosoever should venture upon its bosom. I wish that, when this occurrence threatened to defeat the enterprise, they could have heard that distinguished warrior demand, 'who will lead us on?' and seen the men of Marblehead, and Marblehead alone, stand forward to lead the army along the perilous path to unfading glories and honors in the achievements of Trenton. There, sir, went the fishermen of Marblehead, alike at home upon land and water, alike ardent, patriotic, and unflinching, whenever they unfurled the flag of the country."

But, sir, these gallant, patriotic men, were not less serviceable in the war of 1812, than in the war of the Revolution. I have a letter from that gallant old man who did such distinguished service for his country, Commodore Stewart. I addressed him a note some time since asking his opinion of the value of these fishermen on whom the Senator from Alabama seemed to place so low an estimate. That Senator said:

"The mere inspection of a smack and a square-rigged ship will show that the former is no school on which to learn how to manage the latter. The contrast is as great as between a log cabin and the labyrinth of Crete; and the cod fisherman would scarcely be more at fault in the labyrinth than in the ship."

That is the opinion of the Senator from Alabama. I will read the opinion of Commodore Stewart.

Mr. HALE. He is "green." [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Commodore Stewart may be in a green old age. God grant that many days may yet be spared to him for the gallant service that he has done our common country. I have also a letter from the oldest active commodore in your Navy, that I propose to read. The Senator from Alabama says he has talked with naval officers, who have given him the opinion which leads him to this conclusion. I wish he would give us their names. I should like to see that naval officer who ever fought a naval battle with New England fishermen, who would come into the Senate and decry their patriotism, their valor, and their services. I think the Senator has talked with men who never saw such service.

But, sir, let me read this letter, so full of fact, so pregnant with meaning, from that gallant old commodore. I will not read it all. He goes on to describe acts of personal heroism, of individual members of his crew, who were ready to go down amid the coral and sea-weed in defense of a common flag and of common rights. I will read only—for it is all that is important—the conclusion which he arrived at as to those men who, according to the Senator, are so lost on naval vessels. He commanded that noble old ship, the Constitution, through the prowess of which there has been spread and gathered more of glory to the American Navy than any other vessel; and he speaks of the crew of New England fishermen under his command in this wise:

"They were all enlisted in Boston, Marblehead, Salem, and Portsmouth, from whence, I believe, it is well known that most of the sea-faring men, belonging thereto, come from the New England fisheries."

"In all my sea service, I have never seen, on board of a ship of war—" lost in the labyrinth of Crete?—

"—such a splendid crew for expert seamanship, discipline, sobriety, orderly and determined bearing, as well as singleness of purpose for glory and the honor of their flag, than that one of the 'Constitution.' It may not be inappropriate to repeat here, the remark of the first Napoleon, on board of the 'Bellerophon,' when reviewing her marines: 'what could not be done, with an army of such men?' I can only surmise what might be done in ships of war, with such crews?"

Now, the opinion of the Senator from Alabama does not concur with Commodore Stewart. The Senator from Alabama, on such authorities as he has consulted, thinks they would be lost on a man-of-war. The Commodore says, further:

"In conclusion, I may say, in the words of the Sultan of Seringapatam to the Governor General of India: 'how can I say more,' in behalf of so noble a crew of New Englanders?"

I have a letter here from your oldest active commodore of the Navy, who was an officer on board this very Constitution, a noble and a gallant man who has done gallant service for his country, and who is entitled to its thanks—a letter hardly less significant than that which I have read from Commodore Stewart. What does he say of this class of men who are out of place, who are not educated, who do not know what belong to their duties because they have only been fishermen? I addressed him three interrogatories, the scope of which the Senate will understand by the answers he has submitted. He says:

"To the first, I say without hesitation, that during the war of 1812, and at all times, since I have been in the Navy, we have thought ourselves fortunate when we could obtain American fishermen for the public service, for which we consider no class of men better adapted."

The Senator from Alabama told us they were not fit for naval service. Commodore Shubrick thinks otherwise. Commodore Shubrick and Commodore Stewart have had a little experience in this matter. Both of them have commanded crews of these very men, and they know something about them. Commodore Shubrick continues:

"To the second, I say that during the war of 1812, and for some years previous, great pains were taken to exclude foreigners from the Navy, and I am of opinion that, particularly during the last year, a majority were Americans."

That was in answer to a question as to who constituted the naval crews at that time. I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not present; but I shall state some information derived from him on this point. That interrogatory was propounded for the very reason that I understand, as a matter beyond all doubt, that two thirds at least, probably three fourths, of every crew that tread the decks of every vessel in our Navy, is constituted of foreigners—not a very safe class of men to intrust the interests of your country, and the integrity of your flag to, in the trying times of war. It may do in piping times of peace, but it had better not be so then. Wise policy, elevated statesmanship that shall rise above the catching of a cod, or the locality of the interest, would dictate that both in our commercial and in our naval marine the integrity of our flag should be intrusted to American hands, and American hearts. Sir, it is a miserable, it is a local, it is a provincial view of the question, that limits it down to that narrow point. To the third interrogatory which I put to the commodore, he says:

"To the third, I say that any policy by the Government which will tend to provide during peace for the exigencies of war, 'is wise,' and none would be more so than to nurture the body of American seamen who are trained in the fisheries."

Now, sir, I think these two letters are very good authority, coming from gallant old Stewart, from Shubrick, who stands now at the head of your active naval list, both of whom have seen much more than any other men in your naval service, of the merits of this very class of men. Why, sir, in the war of 1812, you could hardly man a frigate without these very same fishermen. According to the authority of John Quincy Adams, who examined this question with great care, and I repeat almost in his own words, all of the glory, and all of the renown that were won by your little and gallant Navy in the war of 1812, were won by the prowess of American fishermen. They struck for freedom with a freeman's arm. In every battle that was fought upon the ocean and upon the lakes they manned your ships, they constituted your crews. They shed all the luster and renown upon your little Navy, with the aid of gallant officers, that was shed upon it; and now, at this late day, because they happen to be located in a particular locality, and, I fear, in obedience to a provincial, sectional, southern press, they are to be stricken down. I will read a single authority more in relation to the service which these men performed, because it is from a man conversant with that service, who lived amid these seamen. Daniel Webster said in 1852, what is historically true, in addressing some of them:

"There are among you some who, perhaps, have been on the Grand Bank for forty successive years. There they have hung on to the ropes, in storm and wreck. The most important consequences are involved in this matter. Our fisheries have been the very nurseries of our Navy. If our flag-ships have met and conquered the enemy on the sea, the fisheries are at the bottom of it. The fisheries were the seeds from which these glorious triumphs were born and sprung."

During the war of 1812 we captured from the British more than two thousand three hundred sail of vessels, mounting more than eight thousand guns; fifty-six men-of-war, mounting nearly nine hundred guns, and took in all about thirty thousand prisoners of war. Of the captures in the Privateer service, the greatest number was by these fishermen.

Now, sir, I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the manner in which other nations (because we may draw some light from their practice) have regarded the fisheries as auxiliaries to commercial and naval power. The Senator from Alabama tells us that the bounties which have been conferred by Holland, by England, and by France, upon their fisheries, have proved a failure. I do not quote his language, but I think I state his idea. I understand no such thing; and I think the history of the matter proves no such thing.

From the days of the commercial prosperity of Venice down to the present time, every nation which has been distinguished for its commerce and naval power, it will be found, has not only devoted its energies to this branch of industry, but it has relied implicitly upon it as a great source from which its navy and its commerce were to be sustained. When Venice was mistress of the Adriatic; when she commanded absolutely the Mediterranean, and almost the whole of Europe: when she was indeed the first commercial Power in all Europe, and it is said by some writers, equal to all Europe, she had a corps of fishermen, with which to supply her commerce and her navy along her coasts and bays. They covered the lagoons; they swarmed the Mediterranean; and her argosies were found in every port along the British coast. Her vessels visited every port in the Mediterranean, and every coast in Europe. Her maritime commerce was probably not much inferior to all the rest of Christendom. Such was Venice in the day of her greatest commercial prosperity; and that prosperity was, in a great degree, attributable to the enterprise of her seamen, who had been trained and educated in the school of her fisheries. They were hardy, industrious, and energetic, and they went wherever commerce could find an avenue.

Holland, also, furnished a remarkable illustration of the importance of the fisheries in connection with commerce. It is an old maxim—for it has grown into a maxim—that Amsterdam was built on fishes' bones; and when Van Tromp swept the British seas with a broom at his mast-head, he supplied his vessels with a corps of those herring fishermen. A dispatch on the causes of its commercial prosperity, prepared with great care by the direction of the Stadtholder, places the fisheries in the first class of causes as contributing to the advancement of the Republic in its unexampled prosperity. Such was beyond all doubt the fact. Go to Spain, sir; and, in the day of her prosperity, when she fitted out her Armada, and when she had colonial possessions that employed her fisheries, she was greatest in commerce, she was greatest in commercial prosperity, and she was greatest in her naval power. Go to France; and what do you find? I will show that they regard this very class of fishermen as constituting a portion of the naval service. In 1851, M. Ancet, in relation to the fisheries, made the following report to the National Assembly in France:

"It is not, therefore, a commercial law that we have the honor to propose to the Assembly, but rather a maritime law—a law conceived for the advancement of the naval power of this country."

"No other school can compare with this in preparing them [seamen] so well, and in numbers so important, for the service of the navy."

"It may be said of this fishery that if it prepares fewer men for the sea, it forms better sailors—the elite of the navy."

"The preservation of the great fisheries assumes a degree of importance more serious when they are viewed as being in fact the nursery of our military marine."

In another place, in the same report, he continues, speaking of Great Britain:

"The loss of her most magnificent colonies has occasioned irreparable injury to the commercial marine, which is an essential element of naval power."

"In order to preserve them [the fisheries] we must con-time the encouragements they have received, even at periods when a commercial and colonial prosperity, infinitely superior to that now existing, multiplied our shipping, and created abundance of seamen. It is on our fisheries that at this day repose all the most serious hopes of our maritime enlistments."

Again, he says:

"Without aid the cod fisheries could not exist. They furnish more than a third of our seamen, and by far the best portion of them. There is no cheaper, better, or more useful school for a formation of seamen for the Navy, and none is more capable of extension and development."

Let me read from a report made to the British Parliament, in 1846, by Mr. MacGregor:

"In speaking of the fisheries, De Witt says: 'That the English navy became formidable by the discovery of the inexpressibly rich fishing bank of Newfoundland.'"

"And, from 1618, the fisheries were carried on by England, and became of great national consideration."

"Before the conquest of Cape Breton, by these alone France became formidable to all Europe."

There was a period of time when France came near equaling England in her commercial power, and that was when she held control of the fisheries. Mr. MacGregor continues:

"It was a maxim with the French Government, that their American fisheries were of more national value, in regard to navigation and power, than the gold mines of Mexico could have been if the latter were possessed by France."

He says further:

"It is very remarkable that, in our treaties with France, the fisheries of North America were made a stipulation of extraordinary importance. The Minister of that Power considered the value of those fisheries, not so much in a commercial point of view, but as essential in providing their navy with that physical strength which would enable them to cope with other nations."

"The policy of the French, from their first planting colonies in North America, insists particularly on training seamen by means of these fisheries. In conducting their cod fishery, one third, or at least one quarter, of the men employed in it were 'green men,' or men who were never at sea before; and by this trade they bred up from four thousand to six thousand seamen annually."

This is the view which they take of the importance of these men in France and in England to-day; and an enlightened view of the subject ought to lead us to treat them as of equal importance. They are so in fact. In 1841, when war was apprehended by France, M. Thiers called in the services of the fishermen; and M. Rodet afterwards remarked, "without the resources which were found in the sailors engaged in the fisheries, the expedition to Algiers could not have taken place." In reply to the assertion of the Senator from Alabama, as to the effect of the bounties on the commerce of England, I will quote an authority of some weight:

"It is certain that, down to the time of Elizabeth, the foreign trade of England was in the control of German merchants, and that there had been no employment for many or for large ships of the realm. British navigation increased with the growth of the fisheries. Without the fleets maintained at Iceland and Newfoundland, there would have been neither ships nor seamen to execute the plans for the colonization of New England, and of other parts of the continent, during the reigns of James and Charles."

I have already stated the view which was taken of this matter in our early history. It is true, as the Senator from Alabama stated, that Fisher Ames did say in the House of Representatives, that the taking of cod is a very momentous concern. I quote the words; and when I quote them, I do not confine my idea to the mere mechanical act of taking fish, but I look at its commercial relation; at its naval relation; I look at the prosperity of the country, and its connection with that prosperity. Fisher Ames said in the same connection;

"It forms a nursery for seamen, and this will be the source from which we are to derive maritime importance."

Mr. Gerry said in the same debate:

"I will not reiterate the arguments respecting the fisheries; it is well known to be the best nursery for seamen."

Jefferson, as Secretary of State, in his report, 1791, uses this language:

"We have two nurseries for forming seamen. 'Our coasting trade, already on a safe footing. '2. Our fisheries, which, in spite of natural advantages, give us just cause of anxiety.'"

After reviewing the condition of the fisheries, their necessities and importance, Mr. Jefferson said, in 1791:

"It will rest, therefore, with the Legislature to decide whether prohibition should not be opposed to prohibition, and high duty to high duty, on the fish of other nations; whether any, and which, of the naval and other duties may be remitted, or an equivalent given to fishermen, in the form of drawback or bounties."

Mr. Jefferson uses this language in his message of December 15, 1802:

"To cultivate peace, and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises; to foster our fisheries and nurseries of navigation, and for the nurture of man; * * * are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings."

The importance of these fisheries to-day is well worthy of attention. It is our only school of American seamen. Now, when we come to our mercantile marine, when we come to our naval marine, we find a state of things existing which did not exist years ago. How is your mercantile marine constituted to-day? The Senator from Alabama asks; and, I confess, he asks with great force, why not rely upon your commercial marine in time of war? The Senator from Florida, not now in his seat, [Mr. MALLORY,] in a conference with me, said that in our Navy more than two thirds of the seamen were foreigners. In our commercial marine the disproportion is still greater. I think that furnishes a sufficient answer. We cannot, we ought not, as wise men we should not, rely upon foreigners to protect the integrity of our flag, and to support our rights, if we have a controversy with a foreign naval Power. I think the Senator from Alabama cannot fail to agree with me on that point. Home, kindred, love of country, ought to stimulate the heart of the man who protects his national flag. I do not believe there is any Senator in this body who would consent to the doctrine that the integrity of our flag and the protection of our interests are to be intrusted to foreigners. When more than two thirds of our Navy is composed of foreigners, certainly it is time for us to press an inquiry whether we may not pursue some system that shall supplant them, and shall put in their places American citizens.

In relation to your commercial marine, I assert that the disproportion is still greater but in violation of law. Your law does not justify it. Our fathers justified no such thing. They provided that our commercial marine, even in the piping times of peace, should not be intrusted to the custody and keeping of foreigners; but still, under an abuse of that law, I affirm here to-day that a vast majority of the sailors in our commercial marine are foreigners. Let me read from a memorial which has been presented to the Senate at this session for our consideration, signed by some sixty American ship-masters who were at the port of Havana, in Cuba. They say:

"The old class of American seamen, if not known to you, is too evident to us, has become almost extinct. Our crews are composed almost entirely of foreigners, frequently representing as many different countries as their number, although a majority of them are sailing under the guise of American seamen."

That shows clearly and distinctly, I think, what is the condition of your commercial marine. Besides, your commercial marine is composed of entirely a different class from your fishermen. Your fishermen remain and reside at home; they have homes. They fish for some eight or nine months in the year, though the law only requires four months' fishing to obtain the bounty; and then they return to spend the remaining three or four months with their families. They are American citizens in the broadest sense of the word. They have the love of home. Let me say here, in passing, that they are not limited by the number of men who are actually engaged to-day in the fisheries, as the Senator from Alabama supposes. He limits their number to thirteen or fourteen thousand.

Mr. CLAY. The average is thirteen thousand. Mr. HAMLIN. That is a mere matter of conjecture. My conjecture is greater, and it is based upon the best authorities, not your Treasury Department. They have no practical knowledge upon the subject of the fisheries, and their opinion is not so good as that of a practical man. They estimate the number at thirteen thousand. Now, I say the best authorities put down one man to six tons; that would give you about seventeen thousand. But I will not stop to talk about the number. Assume that it is thirteen or fourteen or seventeen thousand, if you please: the number engaged in the fisheries to-day does not constitute the number of seamen educated in your fisheries by any manner of means; because, first, there is a class at home, on shore, curing the fish and taking care of them, who alternate with the crews at sea; and then there are the crews, who go in this year, and who go out next. You might, with just as much propriety, give me the catalogue of any institution, and give me the list of a single year as the number of graduates of that institution. It is the number for the year, but they are continually coming in, and they are continually going out. They are going home to reside; they are going into your commercial marine; they are performing the shore duties of the fishermen; and I state what I have no doubt is true—that, whatever may be the number of the fishermen engaged to-day, they are represented by at least thrice that number who have been educated, and who would constitute a corps of seamen that would go into your service in an emergency, as they did go in there in the war of 1812, and as they did in the war of the Revolution. It is therefore entirely fallacious to make any estimate upon the number actually engaged to-day; I think I am safe in saying that it is not a third. I have not the slightest doubt that there are fifty thousand able-bodied seamen for the naval service in the States of Maine and Massachusetts this day, who have been trained in the fisheries.

I want to say a word here, in passing, in relation to square-rigged vessels and fore-and-aft vessels, of which the Senator from Alabama spoke. But because a seaman is not trained to sail in a square-rigged vessel, it does not follow that he is not the best man in the world for a man-of-war. Take a first-class frigate, and what constitutes her crew? I think five hundred—fifty marines and four hundred and fifty sailors. Those who are requisite for managing the ship do not constitute more than a third or a fourth part. Who are the fighting men? Not the landsmen; they have not got their sea legs on and are sea-sick. Not your whalemens; they are three years away from home. Not your commercial marine; they are made up of foreigners, uncertain, fickle, improvident, and in no way as reliable, and they have got to remain by your commercial marine, as well in time of war as in time of peace—not to the same extent, but almost to the same extent.

Now, then, you have got this corps of fifty thousand men. I say that is my estimate, and I think I am not extravagant in it. How are you going to educate that class of men any cheaper? If you can educate them any cheaper, do it. If you can take them in as apprentices in your naval school, if you can educate them cheaper, in any other way, for naval purposes, do it; I for insist as a prerequisite here, that the honor of our flag is to be intrusted to our own people in time of war. I put the question simply as one of economy; I treat it as a question of commercial importance, but I make the primary question one of naval importance as a school for naval purposes. Will you rely upon your commercial marine, constituted to-day of the class of men I have stated? To show how that commercial marine is constituted, I will refer to an essay upon naval schools, issued in 1846, in New York, and understood to appear under the sanction of one having the best means of information. It is there stated that out of thirty-eight thousand five hundred and sixty-four seamen shipped at the port of New York in one year, not two thousand were American seamen, and the British estimate the number employed in the foreign trade and whale fisheries of the United States at thirty-five thousand, of whom twenty-four thousand and upwards are foreigners. With these facts before us, I insist that wise statesmen, men who take an elevated position intellectually, who can rise above the smoke of their own chimneys and their own localities, should come to the conclusion that it is not safe, in time of war, to repose upon either the mercantile marine or the whale fisheries for a supply to our Navy.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to show the importance of these men as a branch of the national defense. I now ask the attention of the Senate to another point, to show the necessity of aid in order to maintain that branch. I affirm that these fisheries are in truth and in fact so undesirable as not to induce the entrance of persons into them unless there is some protection afforded. You cannot educate seamen as you can educate soldiers in the Army. There must be training, there must be time; and there is therefore a necessity for keeping up this school, in a national point of view, as I have attempted to show. Now, sir, I affirm, that if the bounties be taken away, these fisheries will languish and die. I know that the Senator from Alabama has made out his tables, showing that they are very valuable. I know, too, another class of men who understand the matter better, who understand all the fluctuations of the business, its hard seasons, together with its good seasons; and they draw a general average of its production; and I, with them, come to the conclusion that it is a branch of industry that we have got to protect, to a certain extent, or it must languish and die. Ought we to protect it for naval purposes? That is the question.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator says that I made out my tables to show that it is a profitable business. He should do me the justice to say that those tables are figures which I have extracted from the reports of the assessors of the several towns of Massachusetts, as found in the Library.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will do so, and I wish to make this additional comment: the Senator has taken the value of the property invested, and he has taken the value of the fish caught, and he has obtained in that way the per cent. upon the property invested. Well, sir, the forest man goes into the forest with no instrument but his ax; he levels the forest, and he earns daily the full value of the instrument which he uses, and he thereby makes one hundred per cent. daily on the capital invested! If you take the number of men, take all the years they are engaged in the fisheries, take the amount which they earn, and divide it by twelve, and not by four, you will arrive at a safe conclusion. Because your law requires that a fisherman shall be engaged four months to obtain the bounty, it does not follow that you are to divide the product of his industry for the year by four. He actually labors in that vocation for nine months, and, as my colleague suggests, during the other three he often goes on other voyages; not very frequently, however. The regular fisherman devotes about nine months of the year. You have rules at the Department which prescribe the mode and manner in which he shall pursue four months. Beyond those four months he devotes himself to the herring and mackerel or other fishery; but he devotes about nine months of the year, which constitute, in point of fact, his whole year, to this business. Now, then, to divide the product of the year by four, as giving the value per month which he earns, is incorrect and unjust. The nine months are all the months he can labor in the year, and the whole product should be divided by twelve. Though you take the value of the vessel, and find that the quantity of fish taken may be equal to the value of the vessel, it no more follows that it is profitable to the fisherman than it is to the ax-man who levels the forest, and who estimates the product of his labor at one hundred per cent. daily, because, computing the value of the instrument he uses, he makes just one hundred per cent. upon its cost.

But I want to read some authorities, to show the necessity of the protection of these men, without which that branch of industry cannot exist, without which you have no reliable supply of men to man your Navy. Smith, in his "Wealth of Nations," says, what I suppose everybody knows to be true, that "from the age of Theocritus downwards, fishermen have been proverbially poor." They are poor, but they are patriotic and high-minded men. Fisher Ames said, in 1799, that he contended they were very poor; and a memorial from Marblehead, in 1846, where a great portion of the fishermen reside, says:

"In looking around amongst those who have been engaged all their lives, they cannot point out a solitary owner who has become wealthy from the benefits of the fishing business alone, nor a single fisherman, with a family depending on him for support, who has been able to lay up, from the earnings of the business, a surplus for his old age."

In a careful and accurate calculation, made by a gentleman long engaged in the business, he says—

"That the average earnings were $157 for a man, and seventy-nine dollars for a boy, for five and a half months' service in the cod fisheries and three and a half months' in the mackerel fishery, or for the whole working year of nine months."

At a public meeting in Gloucester, Massachusetts, in 1846, it was stated, after investigation:

"That the average earnings for the ten preceding years had hardly been one hundred and forty dollars, in a season, for a man."

Jefferson says in his report of 1791, that "it is too poor a business to be left to itself, even with the nation most advantageously situated." We are not that nation. Our people are obliged to go from hundreds to a thousand of miles off to the fishing grounds, which are in the immediate vicinity of the British Provinces. The inhabitants of the Provinces fish upon them with all the advantages which they derive from being at home. We must fit out our vessels; we must supply our men; and we must perform a voyage before we are brought into competition with them; we are not even in the same locality with them, and are not, therefore, upon equal terms. Sir, the difference between our fishermen and the fishermen in the Provinces, amounts to a very fair profit in the business. We are obliged to go to a distance; they fish at home.

Besides that, sir, there is attached to this business a hazard that does not belong to any, or hardly any other business which is pursued in the country. It is uncertain, in the first place; there may be what is called a grand catch, or a good fare, this year, and another year may yield nothing. If you take a favorable year, you will show a very reasonable and generous compensation to the fisherman; take another year, and you will find, as the authorities will show, that he does not even earn for the support of himself and family ten dollars a month, for the whole year. Besides, there are the hazards of loss, occasioned by shipwreck.

The town of Truro, Massachusetts, in the gale of 1841, lost fifty-seven men. From the town of Dennis, in the same gale, twenty-eight men were lost.

In 1846, eleven vessels, owned in Marblehead, were lost, and with them, sixty-five men and boys.

Between 1837 and 1852, Gloucester alone lost thirty-one vessels, and one hundred and ninety-four men.

The losses in 1851 were as follows:

District.	Number of vessels.	Tonnage.	Value.	Loss of life.
Gloucester.....	9	629.49	$19,366	24
Penobscot.....	14	696.01	14,400	22
Portland.....	7	369.54	5,600	66
Barnstable.....	10	563.50	24,100	43
Portsmouth.....	6	328.00	16,200	47
Passamaquoddy.....	3	143.91	3,600	17
Total.....	49	2,730.53	83,266	219

This table shows the hazard of life and the loss of property. It is not that kind of business which invites individuals to its prosecution under an ordinary state of things. It cannot be prosecuted, it will not be prosecuted, without aid; and an examination of the fisheries from 1807 to 1813 will show, I think, very conclusively, that it is a branch which cannot exist without the aid of the Government. If it be not of national importance enough for naval purposes, then I concede it is not a branch that ought to receive the protection of the Government; but still I insist that it is that peculiar kind of service which fits men for the Navy, which cannot be furnished in any other way. It is therefore wise that it should be done.

Again, sir, the value, though not very large, of the property embarked in this enterprise ought to induce you to treat it, at least, with some kindness, and with some leniency. Whether your system be right or wrong, our men have gone into business under it. They have, in many instances, invested nearly their all in it. Now, I hold that even if it were wise policy to abolish the bounty, and I do not believe it is, it ought to be done by a gradual system, in justice to the men whom you have invited to go into it. We find by the last returns that there are one hundred and four thousand tons engaged in it, and, at the moderate estimate of forty dollars a ton, there are over four millions of property invested in it. And let me say, that a fishing schooner is fit for no other purpose; it is fit for no foreign commerce; it is fit for no domestic purpose; it is fit for no coasting trade. Unless it be in the fisheries, it is good for nothing. These vessels, upon an average, may last fifteen years, some say twenty; take the lowest estimate. Even if it were wise to abolish this system, justice to those engaged in the business would require that you should at least take the equation of time during which their navigation would exist, as the time when you would terminate the bounty—not less than seven or eight years. I make the estimate of the men employed, as I have before stated, seventeen thousand four hundred and twenty-six.

Now, sir, instead of striking down this branch of industry, I think you ought to adopt the principles which were adopted by Jefferson, in his report in 1791. He says you may encourage it by a system of drawbacks, you may do it by a system of bounties, and by opening up still new markets. How stand the fishermen to-day? Not as well as they stood when these bounties were originally given—far from it. You granted them then, when the Government gave its aid in procuring markets. Now we send abroad but a little more than a half a million of fish. Why is it? The French, who pay a duty to every fisherman of twenty francs on a metrical quintal of two hundred and twenty pounds, which is very nearly equal to the value of our fish when taken and cured, have now command of the Mediterranean markets. They are nearer to them. The bounties which their Government have given them enable them to carry their fish there cheaper than we can, and the markets of the Mediterranean, which we once supplied, and from which we once brought return cargoes, have been lost to us, I affirm, by the negligence of this Government. The French have got them.

Not only has this resulted from the remissness on the part of the Government in failing to find us new markets abroad; but you made, a few years ago, a reciprocity treaty with England in regard to the productions of the British Provinces, by which the products of their fisheries are brought here in direct competition with ours, duty free. I do not know what is to be the result of that. I have made the best examination I can. I have not been able to gather all the information I desire; but in the ports of Boston and New York we find, for the last two quarters, they imported between $700,000 and $800,000 worth of fish from the British Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Having imported that amount in two quarters, I think I am justified in saying that for the whole year the importations of fish, dried, fresh, and pickled, under the reciprocity treaty, may at least average a million and a half or two million dollars.

You, therefore, not only have neglected to supply us with foreign markets, out of which the French have driven us, but by your system you allow the fishermen residing immediately on the fishing banks to come in and share all our markets upon precisely equal terms. Sir, give us dutiable revenues, and you will place the fishermen in vastly better position than they now occupy. You take away the duties, and bring us in direct competition in our own market with those who take fish at their own doors, cure them, and bring them into our markets free of duty.

The whole effect of the reciprocity treaty has been injurious to my State. I do not speak of particular localities, for I know my colleague would tell me that where he resides they have been benefited by it; but, as a whole, such is the result as shown by the figures before me. I allude to it as a part of the same system.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. Was he not in favor of that treaty?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I do not know whether it would be a legitimate question, but I would ask whether the New England men did not support it?

Mr. HAMLIN. Some did, and some did not. It does not matter, in my mind, how that was. The effect would not be changed whatever might be my own individual opinion.

Mr. CLAY. But you ought not to complain of the Government doing anything at your instance.

Mr. HAMLIN. It was not done at my instance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was not at our instance.

Mr. HAMLIN. I threatened very hard at the Department, that if they did not deal a little more justly by us, I would exert my humble influence against it. I was quiet because I found my opposition would do no good. I find that of the productions of the mines, the forest, and agriculture, there have been imported into the United States $9,502,000 over and above what we have sent to the Provinces—not a very small or inconsiderable item when we reflect that the articles are brought directly into competition with ours. What is true of the whole treaty, is still more particularly and significantly true in relation to the fisheries.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I desired. I will allude to a single other point. I think this nursery of seamen ought to be regarded by the Senate and by the American people ple precisely as we regard the military school at West Point, and the naval school at Annapolis. You cannot have an army of officers without men. You cannot have an army of men without officers. The two are reciprocal, they must go together. The Senator from Alabama has said that this whole system is unjust, and because it was unequal it was unconstitutional.

Mr. CLAY. I said because it was unjust.

Mr. HAMLIN. Because it was unequal and unjust both.

Mr. CLAY. Look at the speech.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have the speech here. I suppose the Senator finds no trouble in voting for appropriations to supply the military and naval schools annually. I think he voted yesterday for an appropriation for the school at West Point. I did it. What does it do? It educates officer after officer, until you have got one officer to how many men—ten? I saw an estimate the other day; I have forgotten the proportion.

Mr. WILSON. One to thirteen.

Mr. HAMLIN. One officer to thirteen men. I do not complain of it, because they are a corps to be used when an emergency shall call for them. You have established a school at Annapolis for the purpose of educating your naval officers precisely on the same principle. What have you got there? Let me see for a single moment. I addressed a note to the Secretary of the Navy a few days since, for the purpose of knowing how many vessels we had and how many officers would be required to man them. He says we have one hundred and two captains, one hundred and twenty-six commanders, and three hundred and seventy-three lieutenants. What does he say is the requisite number to man all the vessels we have:

"For the above ships, it will require twenty-one captains"— we have one hundred and two—

"twenty-three commanders"—

we have one hundred and twenty-six—

"two hundred and thirty-seven lieutenants;"

you have three hundred and seventy-three. Now, what is the theory; what is the reason? It is precisely the same theory applied to the Navy that you apply to the Army. You call your Army a skeleton Army. You do not want to keep up a war establishment in time of peace. You therefore educate, in time of peace, a larger number of officers than are requisite, to have them as a reserve corps in time of war. You do precisely the same in the Navy. In my judgment, it is wise. If you read your naval register, you will find almost page after page of officers "on shore waiting orders." I know you do not impose any such condition upon the fishermen; but it is just as true literally that they are waiting orders as it is of your naval officers, and there is not a particle of difference between the two. They have volunteered in every war you ever had as the only men who could volunteer, and they will do it again whenever their country asks them. Your naval officers are on shore waiting orders, and your seamen are waiting orders; and that is the only difference between the two cases. The Senator finds no difficulty in voting for these schools; but this is horridly unjust; it is unequal, and even unconstitutional! What is the expense of these schools? We yesterday passed the annual appropriation bill for the Military Academy, appropriating $182,824. A statement before me from the Navy Department shows the annual expense of the Naval Academy to be $112,667.

The Senator from Alabama objects to the fishing bounty law as unequal. Why, sir, it is a general law; it is as broad as the Union. The Senator from Alabama may tell me truly that his State does not participate in it. Granted; but how does that affect the point? The law which regulates the rates of postage and collects the revenue, for the purpose of paying for the transmission of mails, is no more and no less a general law than this in relation to fisheries; and, if there be force in the Senator's argument, while it may not apply in as strong a degree, in point of fact it applies precisely with the same force to the Post Office laws. The northern States pay more than the expenses of their mails, and contribute that amount to the support of mails in the South. In 1850 the total postage collected in the southern States was $1,042,809 24, and the expense of transportation, $1,496,356 50; while, in the northern States, the postage collected was $2,975,852 19, and the expense of transportation, $1,427,822 63. In 1855 the total postage collected in the southern States was $1,553,198; the cost of transportation, $2,385,953; while in the northern States the postage was $4,670,725, and the transportation, $2,608,295. In 1857 the receipts were at the South $1,672,856 78, and the cost of the service, $2,329,299; while in the North the receipts were $5,498,303 12, and the cost of service, $4,095,267. In 1855 Maine contributed $151,358 to the Post Office revenues, and cost $82,218; while Alabama cost $226,816, and contributed $104,514.

I make no complaint of this; but I only use it as an illustration, for the purpose of showing that any general law, in its application, may draw from one section of the country a portion of the revenue to carry out the system in another. The Senator's own State shows a deficiency in the Post Office revenue of about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars annually; and I contribute very cheerfully, whether it be by direct appropriation or in any other way, to supply the deficit in order to carry out a general system. The Post Office law is no more general, no more applicable to all, than this other law. In the one case the fisheries happen to be local, although connected with the commerce and Navy of the country, and they are in their importance as national as though they spread all along the coast.

Another word, sir. I have taken some pains to examine, from a paper which has been very kindly presented to me by a friend who has resided on the Pacific coast, the fisheries in those waters, and I have arrived at the conclusion that precisely the same state of things which exist on that coast exist on the Atlantic coast; and I have not a doubt that, for the purpose of raising a corps of seamen there, the application of this law is as wise for the Pacific coast as for the coast of the Atlantic. Nor have I a doubt that, when they come to examine it carefully, they will find it as necessary there as it is here, as wise there as it is here, and wise in both instances.

I regret, Mr. President, that I have detained the Senate so long as I have. I have felt a deep concern in this matter, which arises from the interest which belongs to the people whom I represent, without which I probably should not have trespassed at all on the patience or the attention of the Senate. There are a great many collateral points to which I would gladly allude, but I leave this question here in the hope that no narrow view will be taken of it by the Senate, that they will examine it in a comprehensive, and in an enlightened manner. If they come to the conclusion that it is not wise, it is not best, to nurture a class of seamen for naval purposes in time of war, I have only to say that we must submit. I hope this will result as all similar efforts have resulted, for they have often been made and always failed; but still if they shall come to that conclusion, then I ask, do not strike them down at once. As a matter of mere justice, as a matter of mere equality, do not prostrate this branch of industry which has grown up under your fostering care, by the invitation of your laws; do not strike it down at once, but give at least a fair opportunity to go out of that service into which these men have been induced to go by the legislation of the General Government.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 6, 1858.

• The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not believe there is a quorum here, and I therefore move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to count the members present, and announced that there were only forty-nine.

Mr. CRAWFORD's motion was then agreed to. So it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

The roll was accordingly called, and afterwards the names of the absentees on the first call were called over, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Avery, Billingshurst, Blair, Boccock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Caruthers, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clark B. Cochran, Cockerill, Corning, Covode, Cox, Damrell, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jenkins, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leidy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Miller, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Pendleton, Pettit, Potlie, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Robbins, Roberts, Sandage, Savage, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Spinner, Stallworth, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Underwood, Ward, Warren, Watkins, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, and Wortendyke.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that Mr. BILLINGHURST was in attendance on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. McQUEEN stated that Mr. BONHAM was absent from the city, and had paired off.

A quorum (one hundred and twenty-two members) having appeared,

Mr. CRAWFORD moved that all further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The motion was agreed to.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

TRIAL OF WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to consider whether William Walker and his followers, recently seized by the naval forces of the United States within the territorial limits of the Republic of Nicaragua, and brought back to the United States, can be tried under indictments found against them in the courts of the United States, for offenses alleged to have been committed by them in the United States prior to the said seizure as aforesaid, without a violation of the principles heretofore recognized and acted on by the Government of the United States in its public policy; and that he be also requested to consider whether such trial of the said William Walker and his followers, with the permission, and by the authority of the Executive, will not be likely to give rise to embarrassments and difficulties in the future management of various questions necessarily connected with our relations with other countries.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with sundry amendments.

Mr. SEWARD. Has the previous question been ordered on that bill?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, I move to reconsider the vote by which it was ordered, unless the gentleman having charge of this bill will allow the amendment put in yesterday, to give Mr. Rives the binding of the Globe, to be stricken out. Under the joint resolution of 1846, that duty was devolved upon the Clerk, and he gave bond and security for the discharge of that duty, and has taken incipient means to carry it out. The amendment changes the existing law, and I want to get it out of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The object which the gentleman has in view can be accomplished, if the House concurs with him, by voting down the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I accept the suggestion of the Chair, and withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The first amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was then read, as follows:

Page 6, line one hundred and twenty-nine, strike out the word "seventy" and insert "sixty-three;" and at the end of line one hundred and thirty, insert the following after the word "delivered:" "And provided further, That the work shall be done by the publisher of the Globe, and delivered within ninety days after the adjournment of the session of Congress;" so that the clause will read:

For binding twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each member and delegate of the second session Thirty-Fifth Congress, $8,097 60: Provided, That no greater price shall be paid for the same than sixty-three cents for each volume or part, actually bound and delivered: And provided further, That the work shall be done by the publisher of the Globe, and delivered within ninety days after the adjournment of the session of Congress.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment; and, with the unanimous consent, I will make a statement of a single minute on it.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection, provided the other side can be heard.

Mr. SEWARD. I make the point of order on this amendment which was not made in committee; that this amendment is not in order, because it seeks to change existing law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to say a word.

Mr. BURNETT. I object, unless those who are in favor of that amendment, and think it ought to be adopted, shall be heard.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I do not wish to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered. I do not intend to make an argument against the propriety of the amendment, except as applicable to the present condition of things. I have no objection to hear any statement in favor of the amendment. I only wish to make a statement of facts which it is due to the House to know.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As the amendment was offered when the bill was pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was acted on without previous examination, I hope that the House will consent to allow five minutes for a speech upon either side. The amendment did not come from the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that course will be taken.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the proposition yesterday under the apprehension and belief that it was proper and ought to be adopted; but since then I have learned that the Clerk of the House, who has heretofore had charge of the binding of these reserved copies, and is under the law required to do it, had, in pursuance of the duty devolved upon him, made a contract and entered into bonds for the execution of that work. The parties with whom he has contracted have procured materials and have gone on to prepare themselves to do the work in a speedy and proper manner immediately after the adjournment of Congress. The adoption of this amendment will place the Clerk in the condition of having to meet this obligation which he has incurred under the law without the ability to put the work in the hands of the contractor. It is not a matter of any consequence to him, except as it involves a contract into which he has entered under the law, as I have stated. I voted for the amendment; but, under this state of facts, I think that it is due to the House to know that they are voting for a provision here which will hereafter involve it in difficulty, or if not involve the House in difficulty, will at least involve the Clerk in a serious difficulty.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Was the contract made in pursuance of law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I understand that it was made in conformity with the law and with the practice of the House. How long the practice has continued I cannot say, but I believe that it has continued since 1846. Since the Clerk has acted in good faith in this matter, I conceive that the House will not be disposed to involve him in any difficulty.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me their attention for a moment, I will satisfy gentlemen that this amendment is correct and ought to be put into this bill. In the first place I take the position that the Clerk had no authority to make such a contract; and in the second place that this is not an appropriation for the present session of Congress. This is an annual appropriation bill making an appropriation for the next fiscal year. This appropriation is for the next session of Congress and not for the present session. The next thing I will call attention to is this, that the Clerk has no authority to make a contract for the binding of Congress until it is ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me. The contracts have been made heretofore as this one was made, for the Congress and not for the session.

Mr. RUFFIN. I should like to know when this contract was made. We could hear nothing of it yesterday.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The Clerk of the House has informed me that the contract has been made.

Mr. BURNETT. The contract, if made, could not be found yesterday.

What are the facts? What does this amendment do? This amendment will secure this binding at seven cents less a volume than it has cost heretofore. It does not interfere with the present session of Congress, and it will protect us against these contracts by which we pay an exorbitant amount for the binding of the Congressional Globe. Upon each volume we save seven cents. Gentlemen may call it a small matter; but, sir, when we are careless of these small matters we find in the end that they amount to a heavy charge upon the Treasury.

There is another point: It is said that we may involve the Clerk of the House in difficulty. I have as much friendship for the Clerk of this House, and will go as far as any gentleman upon this floor to protect his interests. There is not one who would go further. But I have this to say in reference to the binding of the Houses of Congress, and I say it after due reflection: that there is a species of favoritism in giving it out, and in particular that ordered by this House, which Congress ought to discountenance and to seal with its condemnation. I speak advisedly when I say this; and when the time comes for discussion, I will then express my views on the subject, if I shall get the floor, and shall attempt to show the mode and manner in which this thing has been done under contract.

This is all I desire to say. I hold that it is the duty of Congress, when we can make contracts for the lowest price, to do so, and thereby save money to the Government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. All this declamation about extravagance is very well, and I approve the whole of it. The inquiry which was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WALBRIDGE] seemed to have some effect on the House; and I will say now that this contract was not made yesterday, but has been made since February last, and that it was then signed, sealed, and perfected.

Mr. BURNETT. I have this to say, that if I have unintentionally done injustice to the Clerk of this House, I regret it. However, several gentlemen of this House undertook to ascertain whether a contract had been made, and that fact could not then be ascertained; hence I made the statement.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. To whom did they apply?

Mr. BURNETT. To the chief clerk, Mr. Carter. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] says that the amendment changes the law, and ought not to be put in. I care not whether it changes the law of 1846 or not; the fact is patent to the House that by the amendment we save seven cents on each volume.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to be heard upon this side.

The SPEAKER. The five minutes allowed to each side for explanation have expired.

Mr. SEWARD. Do the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kentucky make two sides of the House?

The SPEAKER. They represent the two sides. Mr. SEWARD. They do not represent my views.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed there were but two sides to this question, and he understood that they represented the two sides.

Mr. SINGLETON. As a member of the Committee on Printing and Binding, I would like to make a remark. I want to explain the action of that committee, as there seems to be some misunderstanding about it with my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. BURNETT. I cast no imputation upon the Committee on Printing and Binding.

Mr. SEWARD. If I cannot be heard, I shall oppose this debate.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, the object is to pay money—

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot be heard, and I object to all debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish to say to the House, that the contract to which I alluded will be here in a moment, when any gentleman can examine it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to.

Mr. BARKSDALE. In order to vote understandingly upon the question, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objected to all debate.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not like to be put in the position of an objector; but as the Speaker enforced the rule rigidly upon me, I desire to have him follow the same course with every one else.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair, in order that I may determine how to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman inquires for information upon which to found his vote, the inquiry would be in the nature of debate.

Mr. FLORENCE. I merely desire to ask this question, and the Speaker can decide whether it is in the nature of debate or not: is there a pending contract for this work made by the Clerk of this House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question is in the nature of debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the amendment divisible?

The SPEAKER. It was reported as a single amendment from the committee, and cannot be divided, according to the practice of the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Blair, Boccock, Boyce, Branch, Bratton, Burnett, Caskey, Clemens, Cockerill, Cragin, Burton, Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Dean, Dewart, Dodd, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Harlan, Hickman, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Mason, Miller, Millson, Moore, Palmer, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Pike, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Seales, John Sherman, William Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Zollieffer—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Chaffee, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochran, Colfax, Comins, Covode, James Craig, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dick, Durfee, Edmundson, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hughes, Jackson, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Lovejoy, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Potter, Powell, Purviance, Reagan, Ritchie, Royce, Russell, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stephens, William Stewart, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—101.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. NICHOLS stated that he had paired off upon all questions for the day.

The next amendment was reported by the Clerk as follows:

"For the usual additional compensation to the reporters for the Congressional Globe, for reporting the proceedings of the House of Representatives, for the present session of Congress, being $800 each reporter, $4,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio yesterday moved to amend, by striking out the words "present session of Congress," and inserting "next regular session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress." The question is first upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it in order to amend by moving to strike out the whole of that amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The same result is accomplished by voting down the amendment. Indeed the motion would not be in order at all under the operation of the previous question.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment as amended,

Mr. REAGAN demanded the yeas and nays and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. REAGAN and KELSEY were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-eight.

No further count being demanded, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRIPPE. Will it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was agreed to?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. TRIPPE. I make that motion; and I ask the Chair if I can discuss it?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is operating.

Mr. TRIPPE. Does the previous question operate upon a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. All incidental questions arising after the previous question is ordered, and before the vote is put, are controlled by it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. TRIPPE. I desire to ask whether that amendment votes extra compensation to the reporters, or is it a mere provision for their pay the next session?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The object of the amendment is to put them upon the same footing for the next session, as they occupy this session, and as they have occupied for the last six years. It is a part of their regular compensation.

Mr. TRIPPE. Then I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the amendment as amended; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clemens, Comins, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Matteson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Russell, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bock, Burns, Caskey, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Burton Craig, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dick, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Foley, Garnett, Garrett, Goode, Gregg, Harlan, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Potter, Powell, Reagan, Reilly, Rufin, Sandidge, Scales, Shorter, William Smith, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—61.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The fifth amendment was reported, as follows:

"For furnishing the committee rooms, retiring rooms, and offices in the south wing of the Capitol extension with gas-fixtures, chandeliers, iron safes, and other furniture, $40,000."

Mr. STANTON. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. LETCHER asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SICKLES called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WRIGHT of Georgia, and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-two, (over one fifth of the members present.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bock, Branch, Brayton, Burlingame, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingan, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Cragin, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dewart, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Lawrence W. Kunkel, Lawrence, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Matteson, Millson, Niblack, Parker, Phelps, Pike, Ricard, Ritchie, Russell, Sandidge, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Stephens, William Stewart, Miles Taylor, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Buffinton, Burnett, Chaffee, Cobb, Colfax, Covode, Cox, Damrell, Dodd, Foley, Garnett, Garrett, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Harlan, Hoard, George W. Jones, Kilgore, Knapp, Leidy, Leiter, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Pendleton, Pettit, Phillips, Potter, Powell, Reagan, Reilly, Royce, Rufin, Scales, John Sherman, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Watkins, and John V. Wright—61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The tenth amendment was reported, as follows:

"Add the following as an additional section to the bill: 'Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no part of the amount appropriated by any act of Congress for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for, or applied to, the service of any other fiscal year, nor be transferred to or used for any other branch of expenditure than that for which it may be specifically appropriated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to appropriations for the present or next fiscal year.'"

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to have a separate vote on that amendment; and I hope the House will vote it down.

Mr. PHELPS asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Cobb, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Rufin, Savage, Scales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Barksdale, Bock, Branch, Caruthers, John B. Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, White, Whiteley, and Zollcoffer—50.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken on all the amendments on which separate votes had not been taken, and they were adopted in gross.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered, which was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALBRIDGE and CLEMENS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-three, (more than one fifth of the members present.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bock, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Caskey, John B. Mott, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Tappan, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Zollcoffer—54.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, an act (H. R. No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Also, the following bills and resolutions of the Senate, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 312) to provide for the collection and safe-keeping of public archives in the State of California;

An act (S. No. 313) to amend an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," passed March 3, 1851;

An act (S. No. 314) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California;

A resolution (S. No. 28) for the adjustment of difficulties with the Republic of Paraguay; and

A resolution (S. No. 32) for the benefit of the widow of Commander William Lewis Herndon.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the House will now proceed to the business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the following joint resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Whereas, The treaty between the United States and Great Britain, designated as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, is, under the interpretation placed on it by Great Britain, a surrender of the rights of this country, and upon the American construction an entangling alliance without mutuality either in its benefits or restrictions, and having hitherto been productive only of misunderstandings and controversies between the two Governments: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to take such steps as may be, in his judgment, best calculated to effect a speedy abrogation of said treaty.

On which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have been requested to ask that a bill for the relief of Rev. Eleazer Williams may be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Will the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. RITCHIE. I decline to yield for that purpose. I only desire to occupy the floor for a short time, not more than half the time to which I am entitled. The gentleman can make his motion after I get through.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RITCHIE. I have just declined to yield to the other gentleman.

Mr. HASKIN. It is a privileged question which I wish to submit.

Mr. RITCHIE. I will only occupy the floor for a short time.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to make a long speech on this subject, or to follow the gentleman from North Carolina in the discursive remarks which he made yesterday in favor of these resolutions. He referred to the Roman empire, the Russian empire, the French empire, and the prophecies of Daniel. I do not agree with him in his interpretation of the prophecy to which he referred, but I leave that to be settled between him and other commentators. I beg leave to say, however, that the goat spoken of in Daniel was a bad goat, and that one of his performances was to cast down truth to the ground; and I hope the United States will never engage in any such business.

With reference to this particular resolution, I intend to confine myself strictly to the question, and to refer, in a few words, to the situation of affairs on the adoption of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and then I will show briefly, by extracts from official documents, that, in the opinion both of the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States, the position of the United States in regard to the whole Central American question is stronger under the treaty than it was prior to the treaty. I will show, by extracts from official correspondence, that during the whole of that discussion the object of the negotiators on the part of the United States was to hold the British Government to the terms of the treaty as the strongest ground for the United States to occupy, and that the whole struggle on the part of the British Government was to escape from the treaty to the ground it occupied before that treaty. I beg leave to remark here that I entirely concur with the gentleman from North Carolina that this House has the right, whenever it sees proper, to express its opinion on any subject of treaty between the Government of the United States and any other Government whatever. But I contend that if we have the right to express our opinion on any treaty in this House, we should exercise it with discretion, and only in extreme cases; and I contend that the present instance is no such extreme case, and that the subject may well be left to the discretion of the Executive. There is no particular emergency calling for interference by this House. I hope, therefore, that the House will come to a speedy vote on this resolution, and vote it down; if not on the merits of the question itself, at least because it presents no case for our interference at the present moment.

With regard to the first point, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the situation of affairs which led to the adoption of the treaty. In the first place, I desire to read an extract from the message of President Pierce of May 5, 1856:

"The narrow isthmus which connects the continents of North and South America, by the facilities it affords for easy transit between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, rendered the countries of Central America an object of special consideration to all maritime nations, which has been greatly augmented in modern times by the operation of changes in commercial relations, especially those produced by the general use of steam as a motive power by land and sea. To us, on account of its geographical position, and of our political interest as an American State of primary magnitude, that isthmus is of peculiar importance; just as the isthmus of Suez is, for corresponding reasons, to the maritime Powers of Europe. But, above all, the importance to the United States of securing free transit across the American isthmus has rendered it of paramount interest to us since the settlement of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, and the accession of California to the Union.

"Impelled by these considerations, the United States took steps at an early day to assure suitable means of commercial transit, by canal, railway, or otherwise, across this isthmus.

"We concluded, in the first place, a treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, with the Republic of New Granada; among the conditions of which was a stipulation, on the part of New Granada, guaranteeing to the United States the right of way or transit across that part of the isthmus which lies in the territory of New Granada, in consideration of which the United States guaranteed, in respect of the same territory, the rights of sovereignty and property of New Granada.

"The effect of this treaty was to afford to the people of the United States facilities for at once opening a common road from Chagres to Panama, and for at length constructing a railway in the same direction, to connect regularly with steamships, for the transportation of mails, specie, and passengers, to and fro between the Atlantic and Pacific States and Territories of the United States.

"The United States also endeavored, but unsuccessfully, to obtain from the Mexican Republic the cession of the right of way at the northern extremity of the isthmus, by Tehuantepec; and that line of communication continues to be an object of solicitude to the people of this Republic.

"In the mean time, intervening between the Republic of New Granada and the Mexican Republic, lie the States of Guatemala, Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, the several members of the former Republic of Central America. Here, in the territory of the Central American States, is the narrowest part of the isthmus, and hither, of course, public attention has been directed as the most inviting field for enterprises of interoceanic communication between the opposite shores of America, and more especially to the territory of the States of Nicaragua and Honduras.

"Paramount to that of any European States was the interest of the United States in the security and freedom of projected lines of travel across the isthmus, by the way of Nicaragua and Honduras, still we did not yield in this respect to any suggestions of territorial aggrandizement, or even of exclusive advantage, either of communication or of commerce. Opportunities had not been wanting to the United States to procure such advantages by peaceful means, and with full and free assent of those who alone had any legitimate authority in the matter. We disregarded those opportunities from considerations like of domestic and foreign policy; just as, even to the present day, we have persevered in a system of justice and respect for the rights and interests of others, as well as our own, in regard to each and all of the States of Central America.

"It was with surprise and regret, therefore, that the United States learned, a few days after the conclusion of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which the United States became, with the consent of the Mexican Republic, the rightful owners of California, and thus invested with augmented special interest in the political condition of Central America, that a military expedition, under the authority of the British Government, had landed at San Juan del Norte, in the State of Nicaragua, and taken forcible possession of that port, the necessary terminus of any canal or railway across the isthmus within the territories of Nicaragua."

That is a clear statement of the grounds which render it desirable to us that this isthmus should not be controlled by any Power but the United States.

I wish to show further some of the circumstances which led to the adoption of this treaty. The kingdom of Great Britain had interfered on that isthmus; and I wish to show that though that interference took place during the Administration of President Polk, and during the time that Mr. Buchanan occupied the position of Secretary of State, they took no notice whatever of it, although their attention was repeatedly called to it; and the first notice taken of that interference was by Mr. Clayton, during the administration of General Taylor. I intend to show by Mr. Buchanan's own correspondence that the first notice taken of it by him was under the treaty. Before that treaty was negotiated, the Government felt that they had not much ground to stand upon in resisting the steps taken towards the possession of the isthmus by Great Britain. I desire to read in this connection a statement of Lord Clarendon in his correspondence with Mr. Buchanan with reference to the treaty; and I desire to say that the facts stated by Lord Clarendon are not in any way controverted by Mr. Buchanan in his reply. I call the attention of the House first to the following from the statement of the Earl of Clarendon:

"It may be true that the United States were not informed of the position of Great Britain in respect to Mosquito until 1842, but they were then informed of it; and yet there is no trace of their having alluded to this question in their communications with her Majesty's Government up to the end of 1849. Nay, in 1850, when the President of the United States presented to Congress various papers relative to the affairs of Central America, it will be seen that, on introducing these affairs to the attention of Congress, the President's Secretary of State for foreign affairs expressly says that the Government of Nicaragua, in November, 1847, solicited the aid of the United States Government to prevent an anticipated attack on San Juan, by the British forces acting on behalf of the Mosquito King, but received no answer; that the President of Nicaragua addressed the President of the United States at the same time, and received no answer; that in April, 1848, the United States consul at Nicaragua, at the request of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of that Republic, stated the occupation of San Juan by a British force, but was not answered; that on the 5th November, 1848, M. Castillon, proceeding to London from Nicaragua, and then to Washington, addressed a letter to the United States Secretary of State, soliciting his intervention with regard to the claims of Great Britain in right of the Mosquito King, and received no answer; that on the 12th of January, 1849, Mr. Bancroft, then representative of the United States to the Court of St. James, referring to M. Castillon's arrival in London, and the subject of his mission to settle the affairs of San Juan de Nicaragua with the British Government, said, 'I think it proper to state to you my opinion, that Lord Palmerston will not recede. I have, of course, taken no part'; and that again, in March, Mr. Bancroft wrote that M. Castillon would be anxious to seek advice from the United States, but that he had always made answer to him 'that he was not authorized to offer advice.'"

I now call the attention of the House to the statement drawn up by Mr. Buchanan himself for the Earl of Clarendon:

"When the negotiations commenced, which resulted in the conclusion of the Clayton and Bulwer convention of April 19, 1850, the British Government were in possession of the whole extensive coast of Central America, sweeping round from the Rio Hondo to the port and harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua, except that portion [of] it between the Sarston and Cape Honduras, together with the adjacent Honduras island of Ruatan.

"The Government of the United States seriously contested the claim of Great Britain to any of these possessions, with the single exception of that part of the Belize settlement lying between the Rio Hondo and the Sibun, the usufruct of which, for a special purpose, and with a careful reservation of his sovereign rights over it, had been granted by the King of Spain to the British under the convention of 1786.

"The progress of events had rendered Central America an object of special interest to all the commercial nations of the world, on account of the railroads and canals then proposed to be constructed through the isthmus, for the purpose of uniting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans."

"Yet, in view of all these antecedents, the island of Ruatan, belonging to the State of Honduras, and within sight of its shores, was captured in 1841 by Colonel McDonald, then her Britannic Majesty's superintendent at Belize, and the flag of Honduras was hauled down, and that of Great Britain was hoisted in its place. This small State, incapable of making any effectual resistance, was compelled to submit, and the island has ever since been under British control. What makes this event more remarkable is, that it is believed a similar act of violence had been committed on Roatan by the superintendent of Belize in 1835; but, on complaint by the Federal Government of the Central American States, then still in existence, the act was formally disavowed by the British Government, and the island was restored to the authorities of the Republic.

"No question can exist but that Ruatan was one of the 'islands adjacent' to the American continent, which had been restored by Great Britain to Spain, under the treaties of 1783 and 1786. Indeed, the most approved British gazetteers and geographers, up till the present date, have borne testimony to this fact, apparently without information from that hitherto but little known portion of the world, that the island had again been seized by her Majesty's superintendent at Belize, and was now a possession claimed by Great Britain.

"When Great Britain determined to resume her dominion over the Mosquito shore, in the name of a protectorate, is not known with any degree of certainty in the United States. The first information on the subject, in the Department of State at Washington, was contained in a dispatch of the 26th January, 1842, from William S. Murphy, Esq., special agent of the American Government to Guatemala, in which he states, that in a conversation with Colonel McDonald at Belize, the latter had informed him he had discovered and sent documents to England, which caused the British Government to revive their claim to the Mosquito territory."

"Thus it appears that the Spaniards were justly sensible of the importance of defending this outlet from the Lake of Nicaragua to the ocean, because, as Captain Bonnycastle observes, 'This port [San Juan] is looked upon as the key of the Americas; and with the possession of it, and Relajo on the other side of the lake, the Spanish colonies might be paralyzed, by the enemy being then master of the ports of both oceans.' He might have added, that nearly sixty years ago, on the 26th February, 1796, the port of San Juan de Nicaragua was established as a port of entry of the second class by the King of Spain."

"It was therefore with profound surprise and regret the Government and people of the United States learned that a British force, on the 1st of January, 1848, had expelled the State of Nicaragua from San Juan, had hauled down the Nicaraguan flag, and had raised the Mosquito flag in its place. The ancient name of the town, San Juan de Nicaragua, which had identified it in all former times as belonging to Nicaragua, was on this occasion changed, and thereafter it became Greytown."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have sufficiently shown that many of the very acts of which we now complain against Great Britain were performed long previous to 1850, and some of those of which we most complain during the Administration of President Polk, and during the time when Mr. Buchanan was Secretary of State. Repeated applications and complaints were made to the President and the Secretary, but not a word was heard in response, nor was the subject ever noticed by the Government until the accession of General Taylor's Administration. Mr. Clayton then instructed Mr. Lawrence, our Minister at London, to call the attention of Lord Palmerston to the subject. He did so, and, in consequence, the treaty of 1850 was formed. Now, I believe that the treaty of 1850 has prevented, in all probability, a collision between the United States and Great Britain, and maintained peace upon the whole subject from that day to this.

With regard to the great extent of coast marked out on the map exhibited by the gentleman from North Carolina yesterday, as occupied by Great Britain, I have to say that the documents before me show clearly that Great Britain desires no other advantages on that coast but the possession of the Belize and the islands of Ruatan and Bonacca. She disclaims any desire to hold possession of any other part of the coast. Now, Great Britain held possession of the Belize, even before the independence of the United States, so that practically the whole question is narrowed down to the possession of two miserable little islands—Ruatan and Bonacca—on the northern coast of Honduras. If gentlemen refer to the map they will observe the situation of these two islands. One of them—Bonacca—is nine miles long and one broad, and the other—Ruatan—is about thirty miles long and seven or eight miles wide. The island of Ruatan contains a good harbor on the south side, but it is evident that the positions occupied by Great Britain at the Belize and Jamaica makes the possession of Ruatan and Bonacca of no practical importance whatever. Any Power which has superiority on the sea, and the possession of Belize and Jamaica, has perfect command of those waters, and the possession of Ruatan is simply a matter of convenience. So far as the power over navigation is concerned, Great Britain has it so long as she maintains her superiority on the sea, and no Power can take it from her. As the gentleman from North Carolina himself said yesterday, Great Britain has twice offered to surrender the possession of the island. She feels that it really is not a matter of any importance, and I have no doubt that she will within a few weeks surrender it to Honduras.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 11, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 126.

As to the controversy in regard to the interpretation of the treaty, I have no doubt the interpretation insisted on on the part of the United States is strictly correct. Mr. Buchanan's argument in his correspondence with the British Minister on the subject is unanswerable. The use of the word "exercise" in the first article of the treaty (which I will read) is conclusive.

This article is the only one on which there is any dispute:

"ARTICLE 1. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare, that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with, any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal, which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

Whatever may be said in reference to colonies, &c., as to the future, that allegation cannot be made in respect to the word "exercise." That is absolute and unlimited in its nature. It is used in a universal sense, and refers to the exercise of all dominion; and, sir, I will say that the circumstances of this case required such a treaty on the part of both Governments. That treaty was dictated by good sense and good feeling on both sides, and the longer it remains the better it will be for both.

I will now proceed to show, by reading a few extracts, what was felt on the part of the British Government, and on the part of the United States, as to the fact that the strongest position for the United States was under this treaty. I will refer to the statements of Mr. Buchanan himself to show that, under the treaty, our ground was stronger than under the circumstances which existed before its adoption.

He says to Lord Clarendon:

"It would not seem necessary to extend these remarks by pointing out what might be deemed inaccuracies in Lord Clarendon's introductory resumé of the points in Mr. Buchanan's statement of January 6, 1854, nor of the order in which these points have been presented. It is sufficient to observe that the sixth and last point of this resumé, embracing the true construction of the convention of April 19, 1850, and which was the first discussed in Mr. Buchanan's statement, being by far the most important, it is entitled to precedence."

Again:

"The rights and the duties of the parties must be regulated by the first article of the convention of April 19, 1850, and these observations shall, therefore, be primarily directed to the ascertainment of its true meaning."

And again:

"In the course of these remarks it is proposed to maintain that this article requires Great Britain to withdraw from the possession of Ruatan and the other Bay Islands, the Mosquito coast and territory between the Sibun and the Sarstoon. The Belize settlement will demand a separate consideration."

Again he says:

"We now reach the true point. Does this language require that Great Britain shall withdraw from her existing possessions in Central America, including the Mosquito coast? The language peculiarly applicable to this coast will find a more appropriate place in a subsequent portion of these remarks."

"If any individual enters into a solemn and explicit agreement that he will not 'occupy' any given tract of country then actually occupied by him, can any proposition be clearer than that he is bound by his agreement to withdraw from such occupancy? Were this not the case, these words would have no meaning, and the agreement would become a mere nullity. Nay more, in its effect it would amount to a confirmation of the party in the possession of that very territory which he had bound himself not to occupy, and would practically be equivalent to an agreement that he should remain in possession—a contradiction in terms. It is difficult to comment on language which appears so plain, or to offer arguments to prove that the meaning of words is not directly opposite to their well known signification."

At another point he says:

"If this were not the case, why their strenuous efforts, before the ratifications were exchanged, to have the British settlement of Belize specially excepted from its operation? Upon the opposite construction of the convention, it ought to have been their desire to place that settlement under its protection, and thus secure Great Britain in its occupancy."

Still further he says:

"Now, whether Great Britain was in the occupation of Ruatan at the date of the convention, by a good or by a bad title, cannot make the least difference in regard to the construction of that instrument. The case might have been different had the question arisen between her and the State of Honduras. The question between the United States and Great Britain, however, is not as to the validity of her title, but, no matter what it may have been, whether she has not agreed to abandon her occupation under this title. Not what was the state of things before, but what she agreed it should become after the conclusion of the convention."

And again:

"In this discussion, as in the case of the Bay Islands, it ought ever to be borne in mind that it is the true construction of the convention which is mainly to be ascertained and enforced, and not the historical circumstances and events which either preceded or followed its conclusion."

Again:

"It is also repeatedly admitted, that although the British Government (to employ its own language) 'did not, by the treaty of 1850, abandon the right of Great Britain to protect the Mosquitos, yet it did intend to reduce and limit that right.' Had the statement proceeded one step further, and specified in what manner and to what extent the British Government intended to reduce and limit this right, the controversy on this point might then, for all practical purposes, have been settled. Why? Because Lord Clarendon must have resorted to the convention itself for the limitations imposed on the protectorate; and this would have informed him that it shall never be used for the purpose of 'occupying' the Mosquito coast, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same. Let Great Britain no longer employ it for these purposes; let her cease to occupy the coast, and exercise dominion over it, and, although not all the convention requires, yet for every essential object this would prove sufficient."

"The British statement, strangely enough, first proceeds to discuss, at considerable length, what it terms 'the spirit' of the treaty, which, it says, must always be inferred from the circumstances under which it takes place; and afterwards, in a very few lines, disposes of the great question of the true construction of its language. This entirely reverses the natural order of things. Vattel informs us, in his chapter on 'The Interpretation of Treaties,' that 'the first general maxim of interpretation is, that it is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation.' When a deed is worded in clear and precise terms, when its meaning is evident and leads to no absurd conclusion, there can be no reason for refusing to admit the meaning which such deed naturally presents. To go elsewhere in search of conjectures in order to restrict or extend it, is but an attempt to elude it. If this dangerous method be once admitted, there will be no deed which it will not render useless."

"It was therefore incumbent upon the British statement first to prove that the language of the convention is obscure (a most difficult task) before it could properly resort to extraneous circumstances to explain its meaning. Nevertheless, following the order of the statement, a reply shall first be given to the circumstances adduced."

He says again:

"Now what inference does the British statement draw from this language? It is, that, as the correspondence which is alleged to have been before the negotiators does not refer to the Mosquito protectorate by name, therefore, they must have intended that this should remain untouched by the treaty. But no inference can prevail against a positive fact. If the correspondence be silent in regard to the protectorate, not so the convention. This expressly embraces it, and declares 'nor will either [of the parties] make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have, to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same.'"

And further:

"In reference to the 'literal meaning of the convention,' which is certainly the main point, the British statement occupies but a few lines, and avoids any direct discussion of the language which it employs."

Again:

"These are but very partial and limited expositions of the motives which gave birth to the convention. It consecrated a policy far more extended and liberal."

And again:

"Viewing the treaty in the light of its own extended and liberal provisions, it was a matter of some surprise that the British statement should have confined itself merely to a proposition for the two Governments to enter into some arrangement whereby Great Britain may withdraw her proteetorate from the port and harbor of Greytown and the northern bank of the San Juan, thus leaving the residue of the Mosquito coast in its present condition."

He proceeds:

"The statement next asserts, that although the Government of the United States, in 1842, knew of the existence of the British protectorate, yet they did not complain of it until 1849. And from this what is to be inferred? The United States had no right, under any treaty with Great Britain, to interfere in this question until April, 1850. But even if they had been directly interested in the Territory, as Nicaragua was, is there any statute of limitations among nations, which, after six years of unlawful possession, deprives the true owner of his territorial rights?"

In conclusion, he says:

"But no matter what may be the nature of the British claim to the country between the Sibun and the Sarstoon, the observation already made in reference to the Bay Islands and the Mosquito coast must be reiterated, that the great question does not turn upon the validity of this claim previous to the convention of 1850, but upon the facts that Great Britain has bound herself by this convention not to occupy any part of Central America, nor to exercise dominion over it; and that the territory in question is within Central America, even under the most limited construction of these words. In regard to Belize proper, confined within its legitimate boundaries, under the treaties of 1783 and 1786, and limited to the usufruct specified in these treaties, it is necessary to say but a few words. The Government of the United States will not for the present insist upon the withdrawal of Great Britain from this settlement, provided all the other questions between the two Governments concerning Central America can be amicably adjusted. It has been influenced to pursue this course partly by the declaration of Mr. Clayton on the 4th of July, 1850, but mainly in consequence of the extension of the license granted by Mexico to Great Britain under the treaty of 1826, which that Republic has yet taken no steps to terminate."

"It is, however, distinctly to be understood that the Government of the United States acknowledge no claim of Great Britain within Belize, except the temporary 'liberty of making use of the wood of the different kinds, the fruits, and other produce in their natural state,' fully recognizing that the former 'Spanish sovereignty over the country' now belongs either to Guatemala or Mexico."

"In conclusion, the Government of the United States most cordially and earnestly unite in the desire expressed by her Majesty's Government, not only to maintain the convention of 1850 intact, but to consolidate and strengthen it by strengthening and consolidating the friendly relations which it was calculated to cement and perpetuate. Under these mutual feelings, it is deeply to be regretted that the two Governments entertain opinions so widely different in regard to its true effect and meaning."

I have thus shown, Mr. Speaker, I think, that the circumstances which led to the adoption of this treaty were such as naturally should have led to its adoption; that the treaty was a wise and a good one on both sides; that since its adoption our Government has always felt stronger in negotiating with Great Britain on the ground of the treaty than they were without the treaty. I cannot see any reason why anybody should ask for the abrogation of that treaty on the part of the United States, except one who has a desire to seize possession of the Central American States on the part of the United States, without regard to consequences. No gentleman pretends to be ready, at present, for any such thing. In fact, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] spoke in vague terms, when pressed upon this practical point, and said that perhaps he would be in favor of some such thing, twenty, or thirty, or fifty years hence, but he did not desire immediate possession.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With the permission of my friend, I will state that my position was simply this: I hold that we ought to be free from the obligations of that treaty to acquire that territory whenever we think it is our interest, and can acquire it lawfully and honorably.

Mr. RITCHIE. That is precisely what I understand to be the gentleman's position, and in order to do that he desires that Great Britain shall also be at liberty to seize any port she may seize lawfully and honorably. I take the practical effect of that to be, to lay that country open as a prize to the strongest, as a glove thrown for a contest between the various nations.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina cited the doctrine of the Ostend circular, and gave it his approbation. I was sorry to hear such an expression of approbation from the mouth of a conservative gentleman like that gentleman. I must say that I look upon the doctrines of that letter as a most melancholy exhibition at once of covetousness and imbecility. But it is not germane to this question; and I have not time to go into it, or I think I could make good all I have said of it. I understand, then, that the only practical reason for asking for an abrogation of this treaty is that we may seize Central America. The gentleman says that he does not desire to acquire that territory except on fair terms. The treaty does not keep us back from that. We can get it on terms considered fair and honorable now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will ask my friend, as he says we can get it on fair and honorable terms now, whether, if it was proposed to annex Nicaragua to the United States, it could be done without the consent of Great Britain?

Mr. RITCHIE. I was coming to that point. As a matter of fact, we could not get it, because I do not believe the parties interested would consent to it. I say the treaty would interpose no bar, but it leaves the parties in Central America to negotiate with whom they please; and we could, with the concurrence of Great Britain, or Great Britain could with the concurrence of the United States, notwithstanding the treaty, enter into any voluntary arrangement on the subject, if such a thing were desired. But I think it well that two of the greatest Powers of the earth, so far as naval affairs are concerned, are restrained by this very treaty from hostilities with one another. I think it well that we are placed in a position that our citizens may peaceably emigrate to that country, colonize it, and introduce there arts and industry of every kind. The treaty places no barrier in the way of that. It simply places barriers in the way of hostilities, and the forcible seizure of that country upon the part of either Great Britain or the United States. It places no barrier in the way of all legitimate and humane enterprises; but it is well calculated to secure the world against destructive contests with regard to that country.

There is nothing in it which prevents us from doing what any good and wise man should desire to do; but there is that in it which prevents any Power on earth from taking possession of the isthmus without the consent of these two parties to the treaty. That consent, of course, will never be given, and thus that country is protected from invasion by any Government. The treaty prevents the commission with regard to Central America of such acts as disgraced the Roman empire—an empire founded upon force and fraud—a people of whom Dr. Johnson well said, that when they were poor they robbed other people, and when they were rich they robbed one another—an empire actuated by the sole desire of dominion without regard to the rights and welfare of the people over whom such dominion was claimed or exercised. I know that in the course of a wise Providence that empire was made the means of removing obstructions to the free progress of Christianity, but it has no more claim to consideration on that account, than has any other perpetrator of crimes who is overruled for wise and good purposes.

I say from the time of the Declaration of Independence, it was announced as the intention of the Government of the United States itself, as well as of our people individually, to introduce a new era in the history of the world—an era of cultivation as distinguished from an era of violence and conquest. The difference between the rude savage, a man who delights in works of destruction, and who looks with delight upon a savage exhibition of physical power, and the highly civilized man who cultivates the field, and introduces the arts and habits of industry in the place of arms, distinguishes the past from the present. What appropriations do we make here? Nearly four fifths of all the expenses of this Government are wasted upon the Army and Navy of the country—I should not say wasted in the present state of the world, for I admit a necessity for it so long as evil exists—but they are wasted in the view of any wise and good man. The revenues of every nation ought to be applied to the development of its industrial resources and its intellectual and moral cultivation; but instead of that they are wasted and thrown away in diabolical and insane wars, and in preparations for military enterprises. I hope we shall follow no such example as that of Rome, but that we shall maintain peace with all nations; and as one step towards doing so, observe this treaty, and enforce its observance upon others.

Mr. SICKLES obtained the floor.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESSES.

Mr. HASKIN. Will the gentleman give way for a moment to a privileged question?

Mr. SICKLES. Certainly.

Mr. HASKIN, from the Willet's Point select committee, offered the following resolution:

Whereas, Robert W. Latham, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, was, on the 27th day of April, 1858, duly summoned to appear before a committee of this House, appointed to investigate the facts and circumstances connected with the sale and purchase of property at Wilkin's or Willet's Point, Long Island, New York, by the Government, for fortification purposes, in the year 1857, and has failed and refused to appear before said committee, pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into custody the body of the said Robert W. Latham, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith before the bar of this House to answer contempt of the authority of the House.

Mr. HASKIN. I desire to say that on the day following the subpoenaing of that gentleman, he wrote to me that he had private business which prevented his attendance, and that he would not attend on the Monday following, although he had said to the gentleman who had served the subpoena that he would attend on that day. As the committee desire to close its labors, I ask the adoption of that resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HALL.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to give notice that I shall, whenever I can get an opportunity, introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 17th of the standing rules and orders of the House be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and that in lieu thereof the following is adopted:

No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, the judges of the United States, officers of the Army or Navy, who, by name, shall have received the thanks of Congress for their gallantry or good conduct displayed in the service of their country, and such as have been members of either House of Congress, who are not engaged in the prosecution of any claim pending before Congress, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LETCHER. How does that resolution get before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee gives notice that he shall introduce it. It can be introduced, by unanimous consent, now.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARNETT. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I suggest that this question be laid over until the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. SICKLES. That would be agreeable to me.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is not to-morrow private bill day?

Mr. COBB. I object to its postponement.

Mr. GARNETT. I would say to the gentleman from Alabama, that the gentleman from New York prefers to have it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SICKLES. It would be more agreeable to me to speak to-morrow.

Mr. COBB. My only object in objecting is to facilitate the business of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the gentleman from New York does not wish to proceed to-day, let us go on and call the committees during the rest of the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. To-morrow is private bill day, and I object to its going over to that day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If it goes over now, when will it come up regularly again?

The SPEAKER. On Tuesday morning.

Mr. SICKLES. If it can be postponed until that day it will be equally agreeable to me.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman from New York in the arrangement he has suggested, with the understanding that the question will be still open after the gentleman from New York shall have been heard, for other gentlemen to be heard who desire to speak on that subject. I wish to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. SICKLES. Then I move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed till Tuesday at one o'clock.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would inquire whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs will have the floor then in the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It will not have the floor to submit other reports. The committee has exhausted the two mornings allowed to it under the rule.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This matter may be passed over informally now, and let the balance of the morning hour be devoted to the reception of reports from committees.

The SPEAKER. By being informally passed over, it will come up the first thing in the morning hour on Tuesday next.

Mr. SICKLES. That is quite agreeable to me.

Mr. LETCHER. Would it be in order to move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and let it be discussed there?

The SPEAKER. Not while the gentleman from New York is occupying the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. Nobody is occupying the floor now.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I hope the House will not pass over this resolution. If it be confined to the morning hour, it will probably occupy the remainder of the session.

The SPEAKER. If there be objection, it cannot be passed over.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Then I object.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to state that I yesterday moved to refer the French spoliation bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with a view to defeat it. I am opposed to the bill, and my object was to kill it.

Mr. HAWKINS. Would it be in order to move that this subject be postponed till Tuesday morning?

The SPEAKER. That is the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SICKLES.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire what will be the effect of postponing? Will the resolution come up in the morning hour; and then, after the hour is consumed, will it be postponed till another day, and so be kept on till the whole discussion has been gone through, before any other committee is called?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to postpone till Tuesday at one o'clock.

Mr. COBB. I ask the Speaker what has become of the rule which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] himself forced upon the House, to the effect that no committee shall occupy the floor more than two days at any one time?

The SPEAKER. The example was set by the committee of which the gentleman from Alabama is chairman.

Mr. COBB. It was not by my consent, though.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My own opinion is, that this subject ought to go over, as two days have been already devoted to it, that all the other committees ought to be called, and that then we ought to resume this subject. That, I think, would be a fair construction of that rule.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee think that that is a correct interpretation of the rule?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know. I have not examined it very closely.

Mr. COBB. I move the previous question.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to lay the resolution on the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] will be entitled to the floor, if the House proceeds with the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not entitled to the floor, having made a motion and surrendered the floor.

Mr. MILLSON. Is there a motion pending to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. There is no such motion pending.

Mr. MILLSON. That motion may be made if the previous question be not seconded?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the motion to postpone.

Mr. COMINS. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if this question be postponed till one o'clock, it will come up in the morning hour, or as a special order?

The SPEAKER. It will not come up in the morning hour.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Brayton, Bunting, Clawson, Colfax, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Hughes, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Leach, Lovejoy, Matieson, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Robbins, Judson V. Sherman, Stanton, William Stewart, Walbridge, Waldron, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Winslow—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Boyce, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Covode, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dick, Dowdell, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Gregg, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Kilgore, Lamar, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Matieson, Maynard, Millson, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Watkins, White, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcofer—103.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SICKLES. I desire to withdraw my motion to postpone, if the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his call for the previous question, so as to enable me to move to recommit.

Mr. COBB. Only for that purpose?

Mr. SICKLES. Only to make that motion.

Mr. COBB. I cannot do it for that purpose. I supposed the gentleman wanted to make a speech.

Mr. SICKLES. I do not desire to speak to-day.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit is still pending.

Mr. COBB. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to be a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to desire to speak?

Mr. SICKLES. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman promises me that after he makes his speech he will renew the call for the previous question, I will withdraw it.

Mr. SICKLES. No, sir; I do not desire to cut off other gentlemen who wish to speak on this subject.

Mr. COBB. Then I will stick fast to the call.

Mr. SICKLES. Then I adhere to my motion to postpone till Tuesday.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust the House will vote down the previous question, and let the gentleman speak.

Mr. COBB. I trust that the House will do so, though, if it wants to get on with its business.

Mr. SICKLES. I hope the previous question will be voted down, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINGTON and SHORTER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, nays 46.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it in order to move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, the morning hour having expired?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, as the previous question has been seconded. That is the practice of the House.

Mr. SICKLES. I ask for the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question to be put. My impression is that the House did not understand the effect of the last vote. I desire to vote down the main question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the House will, by general consent, allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] to make his speech.

Several Members objected.

The main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the motion to postpone has not been cut off?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MILLSON. If, then, the House reconsiders the vote ordering the main question, will it not be competent to move to refer the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was mistaken. The motion to postpone will be restored.

Mr. MILLSON. I thought it was cut off.

The SPEAKER. The reconsideration would carry the question back to the exact position that it occupied before the previous question was seconded.

Mr. MILLSON. I think the motion to postpone has been cut off.

The SPEAKER. Does not the reconsideration restore it?

Mr. MILLSON. I think not; because the House has already acted on the motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The opinion of the Chair is, that if the motion to reconsider prevailed the motion to postpone would be restored to the position which it occupied before the main question was ordered.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RITCHIE. I ask leave to withdraw that motion.

Mr. MILLSON. I object.

Mr. RITCHIE. Then I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. LAWRENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. FAULKNER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to recommit was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

Several Members objected.

Mr. KELSEY. Is there no amendment pending?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BLAIR. Will there be a separate vote on the preamble and resolution?

The SPEAKER. There will, of course.

The question recurred on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KELSEY demanded a division of the House on that question.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bockock, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Watkins, White, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus B. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcofer—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bingham, Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Hughes, George W. Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Matieson, Millson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Purviance, Ready, Ritchie, Robbins, John Sherman, Judson V. Sherman, Sickles, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, and Winslow—86.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CLINGMAN I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SICKLES. I move that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The previous question does not apply to the preamble.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I demand the previous question on the preamble.

A MEMBER. Do not the preamble and resolution go together?

The SPEAKER. The Chair follows the practice of the last Congress, and one or two precedents at the present session. The Chair thinks it better to hold to the practice, though he doubts whether it is a sound one.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does not the order to engross the resolution cover the preamble?

The SPEAKER. The preamble has also to be engrossed.

Mr. SICKLES. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask whether that motion is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Pending the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. If the main question were ordered it would not be.

Mr. SICKLES. It is in order, under the uniform practice of the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My impression was, that the call for the previous question would preclude that motion, and would keep the business before the House until it was disposed of.

Mr. FAULKNER. If it be in order, I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from New York takes precedence.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I thought that the previous question had been called on the resolution which is pending.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understood that when the previous question was called and the Chair decided there would be a division, that he also decided that the preamble and resolution would be under the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The only doubt in the mind of the Chair was, as to whether the previous question extended to the preamble. The practice in the last Congress was, that the previous question exhausted itself so soon as the resolution was disposed of, and that it had to be again moved on the preamble.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the motion to go to the Speaker's table be voted down, then my motion will come up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The practice in the last Congress was, I think, to vote on the preamble after the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Not on a joint resolution or bill, but on a simple resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I remember a precedent in the case of a joint resolution.

Mr. GROW. There is the precedent, too, of a bill annulling the laws of Kansas, where the preamble was adopted after the bill had passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the Chair, if that motion be adopted what will be the situation of the resolution hereafter?

The SPEAKER. It will be upon the Speaker's table.

The question recurring on the motion to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken; and there were—yeas 93, nays 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bockock, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Caruthers, Case, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Cragin, James Craig, Damrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Garnett, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Kelsey, Landy, Leach, Letcher, McQueen, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Savage, Sickles, Spinner, Tappan, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Winslow, and Wortendyke—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, Covode, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Dowdell, Edmundson, Eustis, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Howard, Huyler, Jenkins, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Matieson, Maynard, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Ready, Reagan, Kelly, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tompkins, Underwood, Watkins, Whiteley, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—83.

So the House determined to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Reading the call of the roll,

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, said: I am anxious to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, but as so much time has already been taken up with this matter, I think we had better finish it; therefore, I vote "no."

Mr. LETCHER stated that his colleague, Mr. HOPKINS, was detained from the Hall by sickness.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER announced the first business on the Speaker's table to be the bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union; and that upon that question the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] is entitled to the floor. I yielded it to him yesterday.

NAVY REFORM.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman will give way a moment, I desire to ask the House to take up the joint resolution which was returned from the Senate this morning in conformity to a request of the House made yesterday, in order that we may correct a clerical error therein.

No objection being made, the House took from the Speaker's table a resolution to extend the operation of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" approved January 16, 1857.

By unanimous consent, "1859" was substituted for "1858," so as to extend the operation of the act to 1859 instead of to 1858—the error being a clerical one.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to address the House upon this subject, but I do not desire to proceed to-day. If there is no gentleman who wishes to go on this evening, I ask the House to second the previous question upon this bill, and indulge me in making what remarks I desire to-morrow; the House, in the mean time, proceeding to other business.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to address the House a short time upon this subject, but I did not expect to do it just at this moment.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Cannot the gentleman go on now?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I prefer to wait until to-morrow, as I did not expect to occupy the floor just now.

Mr. COBB. Let us proceed to something else, and allow this bill to go over.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If we open debate again, I apprehend that twenty more gentlemen will want to speak.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let them speak. What objection is there?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and others. Want of time.

Mr. COLFAX. I understand the gentleman from Georgia desires a vote upon this bill to-morrow. To-morrow will probably be the last objection day during this session, and it ought to be devoted to the consideration of the Private Calendar exclusively. And therefore I hope, if it is postponed, it will be postponed until Saturday, or any other day, so that it may not interfere with private bills to-morrow.

Many VOICES. Let us take the vote now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I did not expect to conclude this debate without allowing all to speak upon this subject who wished.

VOICES. Take the vote to-night.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Very well. I am willing that the vote should be taken to-night.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I feel some reluctance in speaking upon this subject at the present time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope gentlemen all around will understand that it is my purpose to take the vote on this bill to-night.

[Cries of "Agreed, agreed."]]

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that he is going to speak somewhat unexpectedly, and I understand, also, that there is a message from the President on the table. What I now wish to suggest is, that the message may be now submitted to the House in order to give some little additional time to the gentleman from Virginia, if such be agreeable to him.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, but I will proceed now.

The SPEAKER. The message is very short. It is in response to the other branch of the inquiry that came up the other day.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Various views have been presented on this important question, the importance of which I myself feel, and which I am disposed to consider; and I now ask the attention of the House, while I present the results of this consideration. I hold that it is very clear that we ought not lightly, and without due and proper consideration, to add to the number of States in our Federal Union. We ought, at least, to see that they come in, in strict conformity with the Constitution. In the consideration of this subject I shall beg leave to state a few general principles, and to make some considerable references to authorities. I shall not indulge in many speculations of my own; but I shall seek, from the establishment of principles, to demonstrate the propriety of the conclusion to which I think this House ought to come.

It becomes interesting to inquire—and the House will readily see that this question is involved—what constitutes a country or a nation? I should suppose it to be clear and undoubted, that in the creation of our Federal system and in the adoption of our Constitution, it was designed to cover the citizens or the people of the United States, and them only. Is it possible, can it be seriously considered, that in the formation of the Constitution of the United States, it was the purpose and intention of our fathers to provide a Constitution for persons who were not citizens of the United States? I beg gentlemen to pause here, and to look at the question in this single light. In the formation of our Federal Constitution was it designed for any others than the people of the United States, being citizens thereof? I maintain, sir—I have frequently maintained, and am prepared, if I can gain the attention of the House, to maintain now—that in the action of our system, in all its ramifications and parts, we must look to this great fundamental principle, that our Constitution was framed for the people of the Union, being citizens of the United States, and for no others. I will refer to Vattel—in sections one hundred and twenty-two, two hundred and twelve, two hundred and thirteen, and two hundred and fourteen—for the purpose of showing that the term "country" signifies "the State of which one is a member;" and is "thus understood in the law of nations."

This doctrine is fully maintained in the Dred Scott decision. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing."

He also said:

"It is true, every person, and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States, became also citizens of this new political body, but none other. It was formed by them, and for them and their posterity; but for no one else. And the personal rights and privileges guaranteed to citizens of this new sovereignty were intended to embrace those only who were then members of the several State communities, or who should afterwards by birth-right or otherwise become members, according to the provisions of the Constitution, and the principles on which it was founded. It was the union of those who were at that time members of distinct and separate political communities, into one political family, whose power, for certain specified purposes, was to extend over the whole territory of the United States."

This is the true doctrine; and, if remembered and respected, will furnish an easy solution of many of the questions involved in this discussion.

The distinction between citizens and aliens will be found laid down in Vattel, sections two hundred and twelve and two hundred and thirteen. The distinction between citizens and foreigners is clearly marked there. In the two hundred and fourteenth section it is laid down that naturalization is one means, and the only means, by which a foreigner can be declared a citizen of a country.

This being the doctrine, I propose now to read from various authorities on the subject, to show not only the policy, but the true doctrine which bears on this subject. It is known to us all that, in the Constitution of the United States, there is a clause designed to secure uniformity throughout the Union in the naturalization of foreign born. But it is a subject so clearly demonstrated that it was absolutely necessary that the power should be confined to the Federal Government, that it did not produce the briefest discussion. It is a curious fact that, in the convention which framed the Constitution, there was not one word of discussion on that subject. Mr. Randolph, who was the chairman of the committee to whom the subject of drafting the Constitution was first referred, says:

"But as the convention had originated from Virginia, and his colleagues supposed that some proposition was expected from them, they had imposed this task upon him."

Mr. Randolph also said:

"A provision for harmony among the States, as in trade, naturalization, &c., must be made."

Mark you, sir, that Mr. Randolph, in making his report, said that there were certain great subjects in which there should be no division of opinion, in which there should be harmony between all the States. One of these is naturalization.

That is not all. In May, 1787, Mr. C. Pinckney submitted a draft of a Constitution, in which is found the power "to establish uniform rules of naturalization." June 15, 1787, Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, submitted a draft of a constitution, in which is found a power "that the rule of naturalization ought to be the same in every State."

Sir, as I said before on this specific grant of power, there appears to have been no discussion. Its necessity, its propriety, its fitness, seem to have been universally conceded; and I desire to call attention to the fact for the purpose of enabling the House to follow me, I trust satisfactorily, to the conclusions which I shall draw.

But, sir, that is not all. Judge Story, in his essay on the Constitution of the United States, treats this subject. He depicts the evils to be avoided; and, although I may weary the House, yet I will read from that book. In sections 1098 and 1099, volume three, of the edition in my possession, Judge Story says:

"1098. The propriety of confiding the power, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization to the national Government seems not to have occasioned any doubt or controversy in the convention. For aught that appears in the journals, it was conceded without objection. Under the Confederation, the States possessed the sole authority to exercise the power; and the dissimilarity of the system in different States was generally admitted, as a prominent defect, and laid the foundation of many delicate and intricate questions. As the free inhabitants of each State were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the other States, it followed that a single State possessed the power of forcing into every other State, with the enjoyment of every immunity and privilege, any alien whom it might choose to incorporate into its own society, however repugnant such admission might be to their policy, convenience, and even prejudices. In effect, every State possessed the power of naturalizing aliens in every other State—a power as mischievous in its nature as it was indelicate in its actual exercise. In one State, residence for a short time might, and did, confer the rights of citizenship. In others, qualifications of greater importance were required. An alien, therefore, incapacitated for the possession of certain rights by the laws of the latter, might, by a previous residence and naturalization in the former, elude at pleasure all their salutary regulations for self protection. Thus, the laws of a single State were preposterously rendered paramount to the laws of all the others, even within their own jurisdiction. And it has been remarked, with equal truth and justice, that it was owing to mere casualty that the exercise of this power, under the Confederation, did not involve the Union in the most serious embarrassments. There is great wisdom, therefore, in confiding to the national Government the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. It is of the deepest interest to the whole Union to know who are entitled to enjoy the rights of citizens in each State, since they thereby, in effect, become entitled to the rights of citizens in all the States. If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens at the will of a single State, the Union itself might be endangered by an influx of foreigners, hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its powers, and incapable of a due estimate of its privileges."

"1099. It follows, from the very nature of the power, that to be useful, it must be exclusive; for a concurrent power in the States would bring back all the evils and embarrassments which the uniform rule of the Constitution was designed to remedy. And, accordingly, though there was a momentary hesitation, when the Constitution first went into operation, whether the power might not still be exercised by the States, subject only to the control of Congress, so far as the legislation of the latter extended, as the supreme law, yet the power is now firmly established to be exclusive. (See the Federalist, No. 32, 42; Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. R. 259, 269; Rawle on the Const. ch. 9, p. 84, 85, to 88; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. R. 48, 49; Golden v. Prince, 3 Wash. Cir. Ct. R. 313, 323; 1 Kent's Comm. Lect. 12, p. 397; 1 Tuck. Black. Comm. App. 255 to 259.) The Federalist, indeed, introduced this very case, as entirely clear, to illustrate the doctrine of an exclusive power by implication, arising from the repugnancy of a similar power in the States. 'This power must necessarily be exclusive,' say the authors; 'because, if each State had power to prescribe a distinct rule, there could be no uniform rule.'

Mr. Speaker, I have called attention to these clauses in this standard authority upon the Constitution, for the purpose of marking what I deem important in reference to the ultimate conclusion at which I propose to arrive. It is a doctrine which will not be questioned by any one; but it will be contended that it does not present the real question involved in the bill before us. I propose to show that it does.

I desire now to call attention to what is said in the Federalist upon the subject, because it was a contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution; it was designed to present the Constitution in such a light to the American people as to secure its adoption; it was the exposition, too, of great and impartial minds, and I propose to read from two of the numbers, one by Mr. Hamilton, and the other by Mr. Madison. In the one by Mr. Hamilton, he goes on to classify the circumstances under which powers are denied to the States. He says they are of three descriptions or classes. One is where exclusive power is granted in terms to the General Government; another is where powers are denied to the States; and the third is where the power is totally contradictory and repugnant if exercised by the States; and I take this occasion here to read his emphatic and delightful doctrine upon the subject of the true construction of the Constitution. He says:

"But as the plan of the convention aims only at a partial union or consolidation, the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty which they before had, and which were not, by that act, exclusively delegated to the United States."

Again:

"And where it granted an authority to the Union to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant."

Further on he says:

"The third will be found in that clause which declares that Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. This must necessarily be exclusive; because if each State had power to prescribe a distinct rule, there could be no uniform rule."

But Mr. Madison wrote upon this subject also, and I desire to call particular attention to his views upon it. Mr. Madison, in treating the same question, for it was one, I beg you to remember, that interested deeply the American people, goes over the same ground with his characteristic power and clearness.

In the forty-second number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison says:

"The dissimilarity in the rules of naturalization has long been remarked as a fault in our system, and as laying a foundation for intricate and delicate questions. In the fourth article of the Confederation it is declared 'that the free inhabitants of each of the States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall, in every other, enjoy all the privileges of trade and commerce, &c.' There is a confusion of language here, which is remarkable. Why the terms free inhabitants are used in one part of the article, free citizens in another, and people in another; or what was meant by superadding to 'all privileges and immunities of free citizens,' 'all the privileges of trade and commerce,' cannot easily be determined. It seems to be a construction scarcely avoidable, however, that those who come under the denomination of free inhabitants of a State, although not citizens of such State, are entitled, in every other State, to all the privileges of free citizens of the latter; that is, to greater privileges than they may be entitled to in their own State: so that it may be in the power of a particular State, or rather every State is laid under a necessity, not only to confer the rights of citizenship in other States upon any whom it may admit to such rights within itself, but upon any whom it may allow to become inhabitants within its jurisdiction. But were an exposition of the term 'inhabitants' to be admitted, which would confine the stipulated privileges to citizens alone, the difficulty is diminished only, not removed. The very improper power would still be retained by each State, of naturalizing aliens in every other State. In one State, residence for a short term confers all the rights of citizenship; in another, qualifications of greater importance are required. An alien, therefore, legally incapacitated for certain rights in the latter, may, by previous residence only in the former, elude his incapacity; and thus the law of one State be preposterously rendered paramount to the law of another, within the jurisdiction of the other.

"We owe it to mere casualty that very serious embarrassments on this subject have been hitherto escaped. By the laws of several States, certain descriptions of aliens, who had rendered themselves obnoxious, were laid under interdicts inconsistent, not only with the rights of citizenship, but with the privileges of residence. What would have been the consequence if such persons, by residence or otherwise, had acquired the character of citizens under the laws of another State, and then asserted their rights as such, both to residence and citizenship, within the State proscribing them? Whatever the legal consequences might have been, other consequences would probably have resulted, of too serious a nature not to be provided against. The new Constitution has, accordingly, with great propriety, made provision against them, and all others, proceeding from the defect of the Confederation on this head, by authorizing the General Government to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States."

In the Dred Scott decision, before referred to, the same doctrine is maintained:

"The Constitution has conferred upon Congress the right to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and this right is evidently exclusive, and has always been held by this court to be so."

I advert to these important authorities for the purpose of letting this House see that every evil depicted there, and every evil designed to be averted by the power thus exclusively conferred upon the Federal Government, is to be revived and restored under the system which now seems likely to be adopted. If, then, this power be exclusive, I ask how the States can concern with it? I maintain that until naturalization is completed, the power of Congress over the foreigner remains. I repeat, and I desire it to be understood, that Federal authority does not relinquish its control over the foreigner until his right to naturalization is perfected.

What is requisite to give a foreigner the right of suffrage? He must make his declaration; he must be five years in the country, and that must be proved by two citizens of the United States; he must show himself to be a man of probity and good demeanor, and to have borne an unquestionable character; he must show that he is acquainted with our institutions, and attached to the principles of our Government. Suppose that the foreigner should ask to be naturalized, and should fail in any of these requisites: can he acquire the right of citizenship? Suppose that he turns out to be a man of bad character; suppose it is notorious that he is anything but friendly to our free institutions; suppose, instead of showing he is attached to the principles of our Government, that it is shown that he is still a monarchist: he cannot acquire the rights of naturalization; and thus it is, sir, he may be rejected in the very last moment, after having been five years in the country, and when he appears in court to perfect his right to citizenship. Congress, then, does not lose its hold of him until the last hour; and, until he becomes an American citizen, the State has no power to confer upon him the rights of suffrage in any Federal election. I think that this is one of those propositions which cannot be controverted; and I think that, as Congress controls him until all the conditions required by the naturalization laws are fully complied with, it is conclusive evidence that the State has no power to confer upon him any political right under the Federal Constitution whatever.

It is said, in this connection, that the States have always exercised this power. That was said by some gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. Allow me to say, that I think that is a great mistake. You know that this subject anxiously engaged the attention of those who preceded us; and without dwelling upon it, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to what, in debating the naturalization laws in 1795, Mr. Gallatin said. The question came up in connection with the right of suffrage in his own State. There were many persons naturalized under the State law who were excluded from all the rights of United States citizenship. I get what I extract from Gales & Seaton's Annals:

"Mr. GALLATIN wished to know whether the provisions of this act are intended to extend to persons who were in the country previous to the passing of the law of January, 1795, which requires a residence of five years before an alien can become a citizen, but who have neglected to become citizens, as well as to all those aliens who have come to this country since January, 1795?"

"Again, he said, one reason which led him to mention this circumstance was, that there are a great number of persons in the State of Pennsylvania, and many in the district from whence he came, who, though they are not citizens of the United States, really believe they are. This mistake has arisen from (an error common to most of the districts of the United States) a belief that an alien's being naturalized by the laws of a State government, since the act of 1790, made him a citizen of the United States. He always thought that construction to be wrong, Congress having the power to pass, and having passed, a uniform naturalization law, which, in his opinion, excluded the idea of admission to citizenship on different terms by the individual States. But he knew the contrary opinion, till lately, generally prevailed. Indeed, he knew that at the late election in that city, the votes of respectable merchants, who had obtained American registers for their vessels, on a presumption of their being citizens, were refused on this ground. The same mistake had extended to other parts of the Union."

"Mr. G. supposed that since the year 1790, from ten to fifteen thousand emigrants had come into the State of Pennsylvania, two thirds of whom believed, till lately, that they were citizens of the United States, from their having been naturalized by the laws of that State. It has now been discovered that they are not citizens; but since that discovery was made, they have not had an opportunity of being admitted according to the law of the United States."

Here you see, in reference to naturalization under State laws, Mr. Gallatin concedes that those thus naturalized were not citizens, and that consequently the right of suffrage should be denied them. He himself was of foreign birth, and of course interested in the question, and would not hastily have decided as he did.

Mr. BLISS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. BLISS. I rise simply for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia to give us, if he has the act before him, the language of the Pennsylvania statute upon that subject.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have it not. I have read from the debate of 1795.

Mr. BLISS. I asked the question because I did not know exactly what that statute was.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The debate was upon the subject of naturalization.

Mr. BLISS. The question is this: whether the Pennsylvania statute, to which the gentleman refers, conferred the elective franchise, or undertook to naturalize generally?

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word upon the point on which the gentleman from Ohio has interrupted the gentleman from Virginia. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that, by an early decision of the courts of Pennsylvania, it was held that a State had concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal Government in the matter of the naturalization of foreigners; and to the debate growing out of that matter, I apprehend that the clause which the gentleman read referred to. It did not relate to the question of the right of a citizen to vote, but related alone to the power to naturalize.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is naturalization? It is the giving to foreigners rights which they did not previously possess, and among them the right to vote. Did the Pennsylvania law confer that right? If it be the decision of a statute, I care not; but did the Pennsylvania law give that right. The answer is at hand. Says Mr. Gallatin:

"Indeed, we knew that, in the late election in this city, the votes of respectable merchants, who had obtained American registers for their vessels on a presumption of their being citizens, were refused on this ground. The same mistake had extended to other parts of the Union."

On what ground were they refused the right of suffrage? Gentlemen talk about this Pennsylvania law not conferring the right of suffrage; and yet here it is expressly said that it did confer the right of suffrage, and these men sought to exercise that right under the Pennsylvania naturalization law. I may not understand it; but here it is, and "he who runs may read." If a man who came forward to vote under the provisions of that law was excluded, he was excluded upon the ground that he was not a citizen of the United States; and if he was permitted to vote, it would be upon the presumption that he was a citizen of the United States; and I undertake to say, and I have no doubt such will be the fact, that this Pennsylvania law was passed prior to the adoption of the Constitution. It was, no doubt, the old Pennsylvania constitution regulating this question, which was superseded, as was decided in a case in the State of Maryland, by the adoption of the Federal Constitution. That will no doubt be found to be the state of things, and those respectable merchants were denied the right of suffrage, though located permanently in the country, because they were not citizens of the United States, and not because of any other provision, citizenship being the fundamental condition to the exercise of this high attribute of popular sovereignty. I think it will be found that this is the clew to the subject.

But without dwelling at large upon this subject, let me proceed. In a case which came directly before the Supreme Court of the United States, as reported in second Wheaton, the court went into a discussion of the question of property, and they superseded the law of the State of Maryland, and gave the property a different direction from what it would have taken if the party claiming it had been a citizen of the United States. And why? Because it was the purpose of the founders of the Republic to confine the right of suffrage, that great fundamental political right of popular liberty, to those who were citizens of the United States, whether native or foreign-born.

I will now proceed to call the attention of the House to the sentiments of our fathers. Gentlemen have extraordinary notions upon this subject. They have the notion that anybody who comes here is at once entitled to participate in the right of suffrage. Every year adds some three hundred thousand foreigners to our population, and they are not required to wait the period of time specified by the act of Congress, prescribing the rule of naturalization, but they are precipitated in hot haste upon the ballot-box, and introduced into the political struggles of the day. Is that right?

I beg, in this connection, to call the attention of the House to what passed in the Federal convention. I know it is thought that there was a policy in that day which required us to encourage emigration. Yes, sir, there was a policy which required it to a limited extent. But how? To that matter I now call your attention. Colonel Mason, of Virginia, then one of the leading members of Congress, who was for opening a wide door for emigrants, but did not choose to let foreigners make laws for us, said:

"Were it not that many, not natives of this country, had acquired great credit during the Revolution, he should be for restraining the eligibility into the Senate to natives."

Mr. Butler, a very distinguished man of that day, said that he——was decidedly opposed to the admission of foreigners without a long residence in the country. They bring with them, not only attachments to other countries, but ideas of government so distinct from ours that in every point of view they are dangerous. He acknowledged that, if he himself had been called into public life within a short time after his coming to America, his foreign habits, opinions, and attachments, would have rendered him an improper agent in public affairs."

"Mr. RANDOLPH did not know but it might be problematical whether emigrants to this country were, on the whole, useful or not."

"Mr. GERRY wished that in future the eligibility might be confined to natives."

"Mr. WILLIAMSON moved to insert nine years instead of seven. He wished this country to acquire, as fast as possible, national habits. Wealthy emigrants do more harm, by their luxurious habits, than good by the money they bring with them."

"Mr. BUTLER was strenuous against admitting foreigners into our public councils."

"Mr. SHERMAN. The United States have not invited foreigners, nor pledged their faith that they should enjoy equal privileges with native citizens. The individual States alone have done this. The former, therefore, are at liberty to make any discriminations they may judge requisite."

"Mr. MADISON adverted on the peculiarity of the doctrine of Mr. Sherman. It was a subtlety by which every national engagement might be evaded."

"Colonel MASON was struck, not, like Mr. Madison, with the peculiarity, but the propriety of the doctrine of Mr. Sherman. The States have formed different qualifications themselves for enjoying different rights of citizenship."

I read these remarks for the purpose of letting the House see and understand what was the temper and tone and sentiment of those who framed our organic law. I want the House to understand that even at that day, when we were in a state of almost political dissolution—a weak and feeble people, threatened with the anger of the British lion—even then the rights of American citizens were highly appreciated, and the privilege of foreigners sharing in them was guarded with jealousy and care. Nor is that all. I propose to read, for the information of the House, the debate on the first bill passed on the subject of naturalization, in which the healthy tone of public sentiment, on the part of our fathers, cannot fail to be highly refreshing to us, their sons.

On the first bill establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, a protracted debate sprang up, in which the following sentiments were expressed, in which it was assumed that naturalization was necessary to give the right of suffrage. The debate commenced February 3, 1790. Mr. Hartley said:

"The policy of the old nations of Europe has drawn a line between citizens and aliens; that policy has existed, to our knowledge, ever since the foundation of the Roman Empire. Experience has proved its propriety, or we should have found some nation deviating from a regulation inimical to its welfare. From this it may be inferred that we ought not to grant this privilege on terms so easy as is moved by the gentleman from South Carolina. If he had gone no further in his motion than to give aliens a right to purchase and hold land, the objection would not have been so great; but if the words are stricken out that he has moved for, an alien will be entitled to join in the election of your officers at the first moment he puts his foot on shore in America, when it is impossible, from the nature of things, that he can be qualified to exercise such a talent."

Mr. Madison said:

"I should be exceedingly sorry, sir, that our rule of naturalization excluded a single person of good fame that really meant to incorporate himself into our society; on the other hand, I do not wish that any man should acquire the privilege, but such as would be a real addition to the wealth or strength of the United States."

Here is the doctrine, as laid down by Mr. Madison, that I maintain. This is the position I occupy. This is the ground upon which I can stand before the country. But to proceed:

"Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, thought some restraint proper, and that they would tend to raise the Government in the opinion of good men, who are desirous of emigrating; as for the privilege of electing or being elected, he conceived a man ought to be some time in the country before he could pretend to exercise it."

"He said, the intention of the present motion is, to enable foreigners to come here, purchase and hold lands; but this will go beyond what the mover has required; and therefore, it will be better to draft a separate clause, admitting them to purchase and hold lands upon a qualified tenure and presumption right, than thus admit them at once to interfere in our politics. The quality of being a freholder is requisite, in some States, to give a man a title to vote for corporation and parish officers. Now, if every emigrant who purchases a small lot, but perhaps for which he has not paid, becomes in a moment qualified to mingle in their parish or corporation politics, it is possible it may create great uneasiness in neighborhoods which have been long accustomed to live in peace and unity."

"Mr. HARTLEY said, an alien has no right to hold lands in any country; and, if they are admitted to do it in this, we are authorized to annex to it such conditions as we think proper."

"He also said, with respect to the policy of striking out the words altogether from the clause, and requiring no residence before a man is admitted to the rights of election, the objections are obvious. If, at any time, a number of people emigrate into a seaport town—for example, from a neighboring colony into the State of New York—will they not, by taking the oath of allegiance, be able to decide an election contrary to the wishes and inclinations of the real citizens?"

"Mr. MADISON said, whether residence is, or is not, a proper quality to be attached to the citizen, is the question? In his own mind, he had no doubt but residence was a proper prerequisite, and he was prepared to decide in favor of it."

"Mr. SENECA said, some kind of probation, as it has been termed, is absolutely requisite, to enable them to feel and be sensible of the blessing. Without that probation, he should be sorry to see them exercise a right which we have gloriously struggled to attain."

"Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, for his part, he was of opinion, that a uniform rule of naturalization would tend to make a uniform rule of citizenship pervade the whole continent, and decide the right of a foreigner to be admitted to elect, or be elected, in any of the States."

"Mr. TUCKER said, he was otherwise satisfied with the clause, so far as to make residence a term of admission to the privilege of election."

Mr. BISHOP. Do I understand the gentleman to take the ground that no person is entitled to vote in any State except he be a citizen of the United States?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, sir, in all Federal elections.

Mr. BISHOP. And that a person born out of the country must be in the United States a certain number of years before he is a citizen, according to the laws of the country?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, sir; he must be naturalized.

Mr. BISHOP. I would now like to inquire how, on that ground, when Texas was admitted into the Union, the persons living in Texas could be entitled to vote in that State until Texas had been in the Union for a period of five years?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That was under a separate clause, and a power altogether different in its character, providing for such a case.

Mr. JENKINS. I would inquire what that clause is?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The clause giving Congress power to admit new States into the Union.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to propound this question to the gentleman from Virginia. I find, by the Constitution of the United States, that there is a limitation on the qualifications of electors for President and Vice President of the United States; but I find, by the same clause, that under the Constitution of the United States the whole number of the electors may be aliens; that there is no restriction of citizenship in any part of the Constitution. Although there is a limitation as to offices, there is none as to citizenship as a qualification of electors for President and Vice President; and I should like to hear from the gentleman on that point.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for bringing me to that point. He is an American citizen. He has a country which extends its wings over him. He has a country's flag to stand by, and sustain him; and will he ever forget that that country is composed of those who are the people of the United States, and the citizens thereof? The Constitution had no more idea of providing against the man in France, or the man in Turkey, being an elector, than against any other absurdity. In speaking of electors, and declaring, in the preamble and elsewhere, that the people of the United States have formed this constitution, its framers, ex vi termini, restricted its character, and confined it in all its relations to the people for whom it was formed. Will the gentleman remember that the rights of foreigners are grants—that even the right to gentle treatment is strictly social, and particularly that political rights are never his except by express grant, and that presumptions are always against and never for him?

Why, sir, I am amazed—perfectly amazed, that here, in this Government of ours, under our Constitution, in this glorious land, there should be an idea that, because a constitution framed for the people or citizens of the United States does not exclude foreigners from the highest functions of Government, therefore that foreigners have a right to them. Foreigners have no rights except what are granted to them. They have no right even to hold land in the United States, or in the States thereof, without the power is conferred. They are aliens outside of our system; and are as utterly destitute of power as the man in the moon. Instead of showing that there is nothing against it, you have to show that the power exists and is granted.

Mr. JENKINS. I am sorry to interrupt my colleague, but there is one point upon which I am extremely anxious to hear him. He accounts for the case of Texas, put to him by my friend from Connecticut, which, I think, got him in a tight place, by saying that that was a special case; that she came in under the clause of the Constitution which allows Congress to admit new States. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if that does not apply to Minnesota as well as to Texas, and with greater force? My colleague objects to the admission of Minnesota upon the ground that it would violate the Constitution of the United States. Now, if it was not an infraction of the Federal Constitution to admit Texas—a foreign State, bringing in thousands of unnaturalized voters—then, a fortiori, it cannot be an infraction of the Constitution to admit a State under similar circumstances out of our own territory, as in the case of Minnesota.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The difference—but, by-the-by, I remark that I never knew a gentleman to put a case that he did not think it a clincher. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. The case was put by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] and not by me.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. And now my colleague has put a question under the same idea.

Mr. BRYAN. I would inquire of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JENKINS,] whether he holds that Texas, at the time of annexation, stood in the same relation to this Government that Minnesota now does? for from his remarks I infer that he does.

Mr. JENKINS. I will answer the question with great pleasure.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, let me go on. I am traveling to my conclusion.

A MEMBER. Your time is nearly out.

Mr. JENKINS. I answer the question of the gentleman from Texas negatively.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. How much time have I left?

Several MEMBERS. Five minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then, as I am so near the end of my time, I cannot give way. I will proceed now to apply those principles. I lay it down that the Federal Constitution gives to this Government the exclusive power of saying who of the foreign-born shall be citizens, and having exercised that authority and said who shall be citizens, the exclusive power is in the State government to say who of her citizens shall exercise the right of suffrage. I might produce authorities if I had time. I might refer to Chancellor Kent, who assumes, as a matter of course, that nobody but a citizen has a right to exercise the right of suffrage. It is a political postulate which he does not consider it worth while to argue.

Having stated the principles—all that I can do in the present exigency, my time being nearly exhausted—I now apply them. Let us look at the evils which this system is to inaugurate. A majority of foreigners settle one of the States of the American Republic. They give form to the fundamental organization of that State. That is not all; they say who shall vote. Here is the section of this Minnesota constitution upon the subject of suffrage:

"SEC. 1. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and in this State for four months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, in the election district of which he shall at the time have been for ten days a resident, for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people:

"1. White citizens of the United States.

"2. White persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intentions to become citizens, conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization.

"3. Persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization.

"4. Persons of Indian blood residing in this State, who have adopted the language, customs, and habits of civilization, after an examination before any district court of the State, in such manner as may be provided by law, and shall have been pronounced by said court capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State."

Now, for whom are they to vote? They are to vote for a member of the House of Representatives. He comes here, and we have a right to look into the qualifications of the voters who sent him here, and we have a direct right to ascertain whether he has been duly elected by citizens of the United States. That is not all, sir. By their votes the Legislature of the State is elected, which elects United States Senators, and we have a right to ascertain whether those Senators have been elected by proper persons. But that is not all. These same persons have a right, it is contended, to cast their suffrages for electors of the President of the United States. They may decide a presidential election. And that is not all. The election of President may come into this House, and may turn upon the vote of a single State, and the election in that State may have depended on the vote of one individual, and that an unnaturalized foreigner just landed. Will any gentleman say that the introduction of such a system, affecting as it does the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the Presidency of the United States, would not lead to a frightful mass of evils to the Federal organization? If such an idea could have been thought of, dreamed of, or imagined by those who framed the Federal Constitution, when they were seeking to secure uniformity in social intercourse among the States, is it to be supposed for an instant that they would not have provided against it? But no man ever dreamed that voters were to be made out of any but citizens of the United States; that the law for the naturalization of foreigners was itself to be practically repealed, and that foreigners, before they had remained here five years, and had acquired the moral and intellectual qualifications required, were to be put into full fellowship with our native-born citizens, and allowed to wield as large a mass of political power.

Look at the consequences of such a condition of things. From three to five hundred thousand foreigners—many of them, I admit, very meritorious and unexceptionable persons—come into this country every year, and settle in our new States and Territories; and under this system they are to be permitted at once to organize themselves into States, to send representatives to this House and to the Senate, and to participate in the election of the President of the United States, without ever having conformed to the requisition of the naturalization laws. In the name of God! is it not necessary to put a stop to this state of things? We are running downwards with hot haste. We are disregarding our ancestors and their wise and patriotic example. A new element of progress has been introduced, but all progress is not improvement—facilis descensus Avernì, sed recurre gradum, &c. I insist upon it, then, that in view of the principles and doctrines of the Constitution, we ought not to tolerate the introduction of a system of franchise that must be productive of such consequences, and which admits to the ballot-box men who, it may be, are unable to speak our language, unacquainted with our institutions, and unfriendly to the principles of our Government. My time will not allow me to expand this subject, and give other views which I would be glad to lay before the country.

Mr. MILLSON obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia, which I hope will meet his views.

[Cries of "Let us adjourn."]

Mr. MILLSON. I only want the floor for about four minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I thought the understanding was that this business was to be ended to-night. If I had had any idea that it was not to be so, I should not have made my speech this afternoon, when I was somewhat unprepared.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks suggested by the remarks of my colleague [Mr. SMITH] in regard to what he characterizes as alien suffrage. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I supposed that it was at all competent for Congress to pass upon the constitution of a State applying for admission into the Union to the extent of approving or disapproving any provisions that might be contained in that constitution, I should see more direct application than I now suppose there is in my colleague's remarks.

In what I am about to say I do not wish to be understood as approving of the extension of the right of suffrage to unnaturalized foreigners; for many in the House may remember that it was on my motion in the last Congress that the House adopted an amendment to the Oregon bill, restricting the suffrage to the citizens of the United States. But if my colleague objects to the admission of a State into the Union because of an objection of that character to her constitution, I beg leave to suggest that we are traveling far beyond our appropriate sphere; and I would suggest to him, further, that in making animadversions on the constitution of Minnesota, he is animadverting upon the constitution of his own State. I ask my colleague whether he did not vote for the constitution of Virginia, adopted in 1831? I would ask him whether he did not vote for the constitution of Virginia adopted four or five years ago? and now I beg leave to remind him that from the earliest period of the history of the Commonwealth of Virginia alien votes have been taken at all of the elections, and are still taken. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not; nor do I admit it.

Mr. MILLSON. I am surprised that my colleague does not admit that to be so; for if he will look to the old constitution of Virginia, he will find that it expressly admits to the right of suffrage citizens of Virginia. If he will look to the constitution of 1831, he will find that the same provision is made there—"citizens of this Commonwealth." And if he will look to the very last constitution, he will find the very same phraseology is preserved, and all are entitled to vote who are citizens of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Of course, that is proper phraseology; but, sir, citizens of Virginia are citizens of the United States.

Mr. MILLSON. And now, sir, to deprive my colleague of the benefit he thinks he has secured by the last explanation, I will tell him that if he will look at the statutes of Virginia, he will find a law coeval with the earliest history of the Commonwealth of Virginia and existing in the statute-book until four or five years ago, in which the mode is pointed out for admitting aliens to be citizens of the State of Virginia.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to ask my colleague whether he does not know that the act to which he refers was ante-revolutionary, and passed before the adoption of the constitution, and whether it is not unrecognized in the revised code of Virginia?

Mr. MILLSON. So far from it, I will tell my colleague that it was enacted in 1792, reenacted and continued in the revision of 1819, and continued under the constitution of 1831, and it was only dropped from the revised code under the revision of Messrs. Patten and Robertson some four or five years ago. That law, I will tell my colleague, has never been repealed to this day, although omitted in that code.

I beg leave to say only this—as I do not wish to detain the House, having promised to occupy its attention for a few moments only—that I have myself, in my capacity as attorney and counselor at law, assisted in the conferring of citizenship upon many foreign voters; and that nothing was more common, before a warmly-contested election in Virginia, than for the county court to meet two or three days before the opening of election, and sometimes an hour or two before the election, for the express purpose of admitting aliens to the right of voting, who never had been naturalized under any act of the United States. And, again, I will tell my colleague that I do not know that this right was ever questioned in the Congress of the United States, or elsewhere, but once. It was once questioned in a contested election, originating in the district which I now represent—the contested election between Newton and Lawyer. The sitting member, Mr. Newton, contested a number of votes in the poll of Mr. Lawyer, upon the ground that the voters were not entitled to vote, not having been naturalized under the laws of the United States. The case turned upon that question. I well remember it, sir, for it was about the earliest political election I ever remember to have witnessed. I remember that the majority of Mr. Newton was about eleven or thirteen, and that about forty or fifty votes of the character I have referred to were given for Mr. Lawyer. The House of Representatives in that case determined that these votes were valid and legal, and Mr. Lawyer took his seat, ousting Mr. Newton.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will ask my colleague if he knows of any other district? I will ask my other colleagues if they know of a single case in which any foreigner but a naturalized foreigner has exercised the right of suffrage in Virginia, except in the Norfolk district? If there is one, let us hear it. I cannot be accountable for what my colleague may do as Commonwealth's attorney; but I beg him to look to the law and the authorities which I have quoted.

Mr. MILLSON. In reply, I can only say that as I have never been a resident of any district in Virginia, or in the United States, except the district which I now represent, I cannot, of course, give my colleague any personal information in regard to the practice at elections in other districts. But I give him the law and the constitution of the State of Virginia. I show him that these constitutions have always admitted to the right of voting citizens of the Commonwealth of Virginia; and I point him to the law under which these aliens may be admitted to citizenship in the Commonwealth of Virginia. What more could my colleague reasonably demand?

I have risen only for the purpose of suggesting to my colleague that however strong may be his objections, (and I admit their force,) when he undertakes to exclude a State from this Union because of the exercise of a right which his own State constantly exercised from the beginning of the Union to the present day, it strikes me that he is taking a position not in accordance with the doctrine of State rights, which has heretofore been one of his characteristics.

Mr. PHILLIPS obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. My colleague could not have failed to notice that I read Mr. Gallatin's remarks upon the notions which prevailed as to the right of States to allow the right of suffrage under their own naturalization laws, and that Mr. Gallatin said that it was subsequently ascertained to be an erroneous notion. I say that, in the State of Virginia, I knew no such case as that instanced by my colleague, in the city of Norfolk. It is very certain that if the practice did prevail, it was an erroneous practice, according to the authorities I have cited.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not know what the law of Virginia may be upon the subject.

Mr. BLISS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PHILLIPS. For what purpose?

Mr. BLISS. It is not to make any remarks upon this subject. There are several gentlemen here who desire, in perhaps five and ten minutes' speeches, to give their opinions, or rather their conclusions, upon this question. I now propose, if the gentleman will yield the floor for that purpose, to move that we take a recess until eight o'clock. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] I understood that it was determined to dispose of this matter to-night.

Mr. GROW. If my colleague will allow me, there are three amendments pending to this bill, and one substitute. They will probably require four votes, by yeas and nays. If we set out to take the vote to-night, we cannot probably do it until ten or eleven o'clock. I propose then that we have a meeting, if gentlemen desire it, this evening, and that it be understood that on Saturday or Monday, at twelve o'clock, we shall proceed to take the vote upon these amendments.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not want to adjourn. I prefer to make my suggestions now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania meets my approbation. If gentlemen choose to go on and speak to-night let them do so. Let the previous question be seconded to-night, with the understanding that the vote shall be taken on Monday at one o'clock, and that I shall close the debate between twelve and one o'clock.

Mr. REILLY. I object.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I was saying that I did not know what were the laws of Virginia in relation to the right of suffrage, and there seems to be a difference of opinion on that subject between the two gentlemen from that State. But this I do know, that to hear such doctrines as were enunciated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] surprised me amazingly. The most ultra Federal doctrines and the strongest consolidation theories ever promulgated in this country, are not more so than that asserted by the gentleman—that the United States have the right to interfere with the State governments. But, I confess, it was with surprise that I heard enunciated by a Representative from Virginia a doctrine which, according to my idea, totally puts down everything like a recognition of State rights.

Mr. Speaker, it is a little matter to inquire about here. It is, perhaps, unimportant whether a foreigner has a right to vote in a State or not. But I claim that each State shall have the right to govern itself. I claim it under that provision of the Constitution which says that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people;" and I challenge the gentleman, ingenious as I know him to be, to find anything in the Constitution of the United States which tends to show that any State in this Union ever intended to surrender to the Federal Government the right to control its own affairs, or the right to direct who shall exercise the right of suffrage within it. I mean to show the gentleman, if he will be taught, by the language of the Constitution of the United States, that the difference between "citizens" and "people" was well understood by those who framed it, and that difference must be applied here to justify the gentleman's vote for the Kansas-Nebraska act, which, I believe, contained a clause similar to that which he finds so obnoxious in the constitution of Minnesota.

Now, we find in the Federalist, in one of Mr. Madison's papers, this language:

"Do these principles, in fine, require that the powers of the Federal Government should be limited, and that beyond this limit the States should be left in possession of their sovereignty and independence? We have seen that in the new Government as in the old, the general powers are limited, and that the States, in all unenumerated cases, are left in the enjoyment of their sovereign and independent jurisdiction."

And we find, when we come to ascertain from the differences of opinion and confusion of minds which pervaded the formation of the Constitution, some one element, that the one which pervaded it more than any other was, that nothing was taken away from a State which was not expressly declared in the Constitution to be surrendered to the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. In order to mark my views upon the subject of State rights I rejoice in the very number of the Hamilton paper from which I read. I read a clause in which he spoke of a residuary class of powers not granted to the Federal Government, as exclusively residing in the States. But let the gentleman from Pennsylvania bear in mind that one of the rights of the States is the right to the Union, and that the rights of the States are defined by the Federal Constitution, leaving in the States, as one residuary mass of powers, all those which have not been granted to the Federal Government. But if it be, according to my view, that the right of citizenship can alone be conferred upon those of foreign birth by Federal authority, and that the States alone have the right to say who of those that are citizens shall exercise the right of suffrage; I would like to know how that is interfering with the right of a State?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman assumes the whole ground. It is begging a question to say they are citizens of the United States. The argument refutes itself. I will do little more than refer to the Constitution of the United States, and assert what I believe to be the right of my State—a State which, though she has not said as much about State rights as the State of Virginia, will stand up equally firmly in resistance to Federal usurpation. The gentleman says that the powers reserved to the States are enumerated powers. I insist that those given up to the General Government are the enumerated powers, and all others are expressly reserved and retained. It cannot be sustained that a State can exercise only enumerated powers. Sovereignty includes all power; and such part of a State's sovereignty only as she has contributed to the national stock is lost to her. If the Constitution of the United States shows no delegation of authority to Congress to regulate the qualifications of electors in the States, it cannot be seriously argued that Congress can exercise such right.

I want the gentleman to tell me where such a right exists. I ask him to show me in the Constitution of the United States, if he can, where any State of this Union has surrendered to the Federal Government the right to prescribe the qualifications of electors; for such ought to be his task. But I will take the labor on myself, and save the gentleman the trouble, and show him the contrary thereof. I will show him that, by that very Constitution, there are recognized, as among the people of the United States, the "people" of the United States, and also "citizens" of the United States; and it is not asking too much to suppose that those who made the Constitution, who studied it for hours, days, weeks, and months, did not put into it words which were not well studied and thought over, and that they had not as much intelligence, and did not as well understand the meaning and bearing of them, as ourselves.

I ask the gentleman's attention to the very first article of the Constitution, and he will find that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every two years by the people of the several States. And must the electors have the qualifications of being citizens of the United States? No; they shall only have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. That is to say, recognizing that each State will have a Legislature, as being the republican form of government, whosoever you, gentlemen, who govern the State of Virginia, or we, who help to govern the State of Pennsylvania, shall consider entitled to vote for members of the House of Representatives of our several States, may vote for members of the House of Representatives of the United States. There are no words of exclusion there.

And now, if the gentleman will look at the next section, he will find that no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States—not of the State, Mr. Speaker, but of the United States. Those who made that Constitution recognized the difference.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would like to know, if the gentleman will tell me, the difference between a citizen of the State, and a citizen of the United States.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Perhaps it may be immaterial to inquire.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Oh! no; it is very material.

Mr. PHILLIPS. There has been a great difference of opinion on that subject. When the gentleman shows me that the right of suffrage is confined to the citizens of a State, then it may become another question; but while no such question is presented, it is hardly worth while to argue any abstract question and one the solution of which certainly would not result in the gentleman's favor.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should like the gentleman to tell me distinctly, because thereby may hang the question. I maintain this, that the citizen of a State is, ex vi termini, a citizen of the United States, and that there is no such thing as an independent citizenship of the United States.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, sir, for the sake of the argument, let us concede it. The question does not arise here. Let any man on this floor show me that from first to last of this Constitution by which we are bound to steer, of this Constitution from which we derive all the power which we ought to exercise, there is anything which indicates that the right of suffrage must be confined to the citizens of a State. I decline, therefore, to argue an immaterial issue—one, too, which I know has been attended with great differences of opinion; for certainly the gentleman cannot find out how the question arises here.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that in politics, as in figures, and many other things, there are certain conceded premises. In politics, the concession is that when a people form a government for themselves, it is intended to be confined to themselves, or such as they may formally admit within their body. I have labored to establish that principle, and to show that that was the purpose of those who framed the Federal Constitution, as it is the purpose of those who frame State constitutions. I have assumed it as a postulate, and if it be correct the gentleman will readily see that his argument has no foundation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am glad to agree with the gentleman in one of his positions. His premises are sound; but he draws illogical conclusions. I agree with his premises; but I deny that the words "people" and "citizens" are identical. I agree with him that the people may form such government as they please; and I agree with him that they may admit to the right of participation in the Government such persons as they please; but out of his own mouth I beg leave to convict him, when he says that they may admit to participation such persons as they please, and when they admit aliens, who are thus people—because they allow them to be such—then, according to the gentleman's premises, they have a perfect right to do so.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman will allow me to remind him of what I am sure he has forgotten. The celebrated Dred Scott case recognizes as correlative terms the words "people" and "citizens." Judge Taney so declares expressly, and I know the gentleman entertains too high an opinion of the Supreme Court to question anything it says.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I deny that he has said so. The gentleman cannot show that. If the court did say such a thing as that, it said what it should not have said, though I think no such thing was there asserted. At the same time, if that was a point decided, I certainly would submit, because the decision of the Supreme Court, with me, makes law. But, Mr. Speaker, it never decided any such thing, if I understand the decision aright.

Now, I want to turn back the attention of the gentleman to what he and I are bound to regard—the Constitution of the United States; and I again say that he will find that the framers of that Constitution recognized the difference between the words "people" and "citizens," and that they intended that the people of the States admitted to participate should be people for the purposes of government.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I want the gentleman to see what Judge Taney says:

"The words 'people' of the United States and 'citizens' are synonymous terms."

Mr. PHILLIPS. Very well. I do not know exactly in what connection that is said, and the gentleman is entitled to all the inference that can be drawn from it in his favor.

But, Mr. Speaker, I want the gentleman's attention to another thing. If I understood him correctly—and if not it is my fault—his objection is that this constitution of Minnesota is not republican in effect. Am I right there?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I mean this: that this Minnesota constitution in allowing those who are not citizens of the United States to vote, is a constitution in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Then you mean that it is not republican. But I wish to call the gentleman's attention to something else. If it is not republican in form that constitutes an objection to the admission of the State. His objection is that it is anti-republican, or not republican; his objection must mean that or nothing.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is unconstitutional.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That means the same thing. But I invite the honorable gentleman's attention to another clause of the Constitution. We must take care in admitting a State that it has a republican form of government; but, Mr. Speaker, we must also take care that it continues to have a republican form of government, for the Constitution says, "the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government." Now, I ask the gentleman where his argument will lead? Will he tell us that the States which have admitted to the right of suffrage those who are not citizens shall be put out of the Union or rebuked? And that is exactly where his course of argument must carry him. If it is true that you cannot admit a State without a republican form of government, it is equally true that you have guaranteed that the form of government shall continue republican; and if it be so, none but citizens of the United States can vote, according to the gentleman's theory, otherwise the government would not be republican. What will the gentleman from Virginia do with the State of New York, where those not recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States as citizens of the United States—negroes—are allowed to vote if they own $250 worth of property; the difference between a white voter and a negro being just that sum?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is no clause in the Constitution, that I am aware of, that in terms requires us to look into the constitution even to ascertain whether it is republican in form; but as we only may admit new States into the Union, and as that implies an exercise of the judgment, we have a right to look into the constitution; and if, on doing that, I find that the constitution is violative of the Constitution of the United States, it is my duty to refuse my assent to its acceptance. As to New York or Pennsylvania, in the days of Mr. Gallatin, when he acknowledged the error, or Virginia, or any other State that may have committed an error, I suppose their error is no refutation of my argument if it be sound and in conformity with the Constitution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. There can be no difference. The gentleman's objection to this constitution rests, then, upon the ground that it is anti-republican, for that which violates the Constitution of the United States we do not recognize as republican; and if that is the test which is to be applied to Minnesota, and to prevent her from becoming a State, he ought to call the attention of the authorities to the necessity of similar provisions being extirpated from any constitution into which they have been introduced.

Mr. Speaker, some of my friends have handed me the Dred Scott decision, and have asked me to read one or two passages to the gentleman, which I have no doubt he must have overlooked. This is from the opinion of the court, pronounced by the distinguished Chief Justice:

"Undoubtedly, a person may be a citizen, that is, a member of the community who form the sovereignty, although he exercises no share of the political power, and is incapacitated from holding particular offices. Women and minors, who form a part of the political family, cannot vote; and when a property qualification is required to vote or hold a particular office, those who have not the necessary qualification cannot vote or hold the office, yet they are citizens. "So, too, a person may be entitled to vote by the law of the State, who is not a citizen even of the State itself."

The gentleman's respect for authority, and for the authority of Chief Justice Taney, will, I am sure, make him recant all that he has said in opposition to these views.

The Chief Justice adds:

"And in some of the States of the Union, foreigners not naturalized, are allowed to vote. And the State may give the right to free negroes and mulattoes, but that does not make them citizens of the State, and still less of the United States."

I do not suppose that I need refer to any books to satisfy all that citizenship of the United States is not a necessary qualification to the right of suffrage in a State, if the State chooses to dispense with it.

Mr. BLISS made a remark questioning the validity of the Dred Scott decision, which it was impossible for the reporter to hear.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have great respect for the opinions of the Supreme Court, because, as I have already said, it is a tribunal whose decisions I recognize as making law; and I think the best thing we can do is to recognize as binding the authority of those whose decisions we are told by the Constitution shall be law. So much in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio.

But I want to have the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] a step or two further. Did he vote for the admission of Kansas?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I voted for the report of the committee of conference, certainly.

Mr. PHILLIPS. He voted for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; which, I believe, contains a provision similar in all its features to this one in the Minnesota constitution.

[Loud cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. TRIPPE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, foreigners could vote under the territorial laws. By the territorial laws they are allowed to vote.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. PHILLIPS. If gentlemen will allow me I will get it right. I know that the organic act allowed foreigners to vote, and that, under the territorial laws, they could vote.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of order. I wish it understood that I have no sort of objection to a general cross-examination, in which all sides of the House may participate, as to what the Kansas constitution means.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not see that that is any question of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it due to all of us, if the merits of the constitution are to be discussed, that we should have the privilege of cross-examining gentlemen as to how the act passed the other day is to be construed.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is that a point of order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will please state his question of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is, first, that it is not in order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be discussing the Kansas question; and secondly, that it is not in order for him to be interrupted, unless it be for personal explanation. If the gentleman from Virginia desires to make a personal explanation, I will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia cannot interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Oh, I hope he will withdraw the objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand what the gentleman desires to say in the nature of a personal explanation, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I should be glad to know how long the gentleman is going to take. He has had most of my time already.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman read from the Dred Scott decision, and I beg leave to continue the reading. Chief Justice Taney says:

"The Constitution has conferred on Congress the right to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and this right is evidently exclusive, and has always been held by this court to be so. Consequently, no State, since the adoption of the Constitution, can, by naturalizing an alien, invest him with the rights and privileges secured to a citizen of a State under the Federal Government, although, so far as the State alone was concerned, he would undoubtedly be entitled to the rights of a citizen, and clothed with all the rights and immunities which the constitution and laws of the State attached to that character."

In the exercise of all these powers within the domestic management of the State, his power exists; but he cannot exercise any power under the Federal Constitution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I agree to what the gentleman has read and said. I agree that the States cannot naturalize, because they have conferred upon the Federal Government the exclusive power; nor does any State attempt to exercise such a right; but I deny the right of the Federal Government to interfere with the qualifications of electors in my State or in any State.

I am reminded that when I spoke of the Kansas act, I should have called it the Kansas-Nebraska act, for which the gentleman voted. But that is not material. I would rather address myself to the gentleman's judgment than to his inconsistencies, if there are any.

Now, sir, a word or two as to Minnesota. Here is a Territory with a population sufficient in numbers, and, I apprehend, in intelligence and good conduct, to be entitled to admission into the Union as a State. She comes here as every other Territory does, known and independent. She comes under an act passed by the last Congress, telling her to make a constitution and submit it to the people without any restrictions—not to the citizens—and that she shall be admitted if it is republican in form. And if gentlemen will turn to the enabling act of Minnesota, (if I recollect rightly, and if I am wrong, I am willing to be corrected,) they will find that where it provides for the election of delegates to the convention, it prescribes the qualifications of voters; but where it speaks of the submission of the constitution to the people, it does not do any such thing; tacitly allowing the right of all the people the proper authorities of the inchoate State might recognize as such. I am not going to argue the question of either alien or citizen suffrage—each State can regulate that as she chooses; it is part of her domestic policy in which the Federal Government cannot intervene; all that I claim and insist upon is the right of each State to manage that for herself, and therefore if the constitution of Minnesota be republican in form, and her population sufficient, she should be admitted.

A word or two now on the bill itself; for the doctrine of the gentleman seemed to be in such conflict with what I have been taught to believe was the rights of the States, that I could not forbear expressing my dissent.

There is an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] upon which I wish to make a single remark, because it seems to be objectionable. It is, that the number of Representatives shall be, two or three, as the House shall determine, until a census can be taken, and after that as many as the State shall be entitled to under the present apportionment, and until the general apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States. I oppose that, because it is making an inequality against the other States; it is giving to Minnesota an increased representation, when the other States whose population has increased would not get it. It seems to be in opposition to the usual practice, is of no practical usefulness, and, to say the best of it, of doubtful constitutionality. Other States have their representation fixed by the census of 1850, and must remain unchanged until a new apportionment is made upon the census of 1860. The population of some of these has so largely increased that they would now be entitled to more Representatives than they have; but that cannot be just now. And there is no reason why Minnesota's representation, once fixed, shall not continue so until the time of the general change. Such is the contemplation of the Constitution and the laws, and therefore the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia ought not to prevail.

In regard to the admission of Minnesota, the good faith of Congress—the Thirty-Fourth Congress—and the good faith of the people, require that we should give a State government to the people of that Territory.

The population of Minnesota largely exceeds that of many States already in the Union; her institutions have been shaped after republican examples; her State government has been prepared in a manner promising prosperity and success, and these things have been done in conformity with the suggestions of the enabling act of the last Congress. The feeling of duty which induced me to vote for the admission of Kansas, prompts me to advocate the right of Minnesota to the same privilege. While we may refuse, we ought to have a valid and sufficient reason for so doing, and not justify it upon the violent doctrine that "might makes right." Let us rather welcome the advent of our new sister State—one, too, that has served patiently, faithfully, and peaceably as a territorial dependant; and in admitting her "on an equal footing with the other States," allow her, as is conceded to the other States, the right to manage her own institutions in her own way.

Mr. BLISS. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the House for more than five or ten minutes; and I should not occupy it at all upon this question, but for the very strange and, to me, novel constructions that I have heard given to the Constitution of the United States, as to the power of the Government over the qualification of electors in the several States. I listened, yesterday, with some attention, to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] as I always listen with great pleasure to anything that falls from his lips; and I have listened with attention to-day to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Smith,] construing the preamble and second section of the first article of the Constitution; and while I do not propose to go into the subject at great length, and perhaps will not occupy as much time as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Phillips,] who preceded me, yet I will give what I understand to be the constitutional, the State-rights, and the Democratic rule on this question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I will suggest, as a good many gentlemen have engagements to-night, and it seems to be evident that we cannot get a vote to-night, that we agree by unanimous consent that this bill shall be taken up at twelve o'clock m. on Saturday next, and that the vote be taken at one o'clock.

Mr. COMINS. I ask that it be postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. REILLY. If it goes over beyond Saturday I shall object.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I made my proposition at the suggestion of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. COMINS withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If the gentleman will yield to me I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BLISS. I prefer to go on now.

Mr. Speaker, before giving my views on this question, I wish to say distinctly, in order to avoid all misconception, that were I a citizen of Minnesota, or any other Territory about to adopt a State constitution, I should favor the adoption, in relation to electors, of precisely the provision which we have in the State of Ohio, namely: making electors of none but citizens of the United States. That is the law in Ohio, and it is a law which has been acquiesced in by men of all parties. I never knew an elector, whether of native or foreign birth, who desired any change in that law. I desire no change in it, and I do not place my support of the constitution of Minnesota on the ground of approval of that provision, but I acknowledge the power of the people to adopt this provision, if they see fit.

The gentlemen, if I understand them, claim that this provision in the constitution of Minnesota is contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, that the constitution itself should be rejected. Well, I acknowledge the right of the Congress of the United States to pass upon constitutions submitted to us, and to accept or to reject a State in accordance with their opinion of that constitution. If any Territory of the Union shall form a constitution which violates the fundamental rights of man, or which renders them unfit or unsafe associates for the other States of the Union, or if they adopt a constitution which violates any of the essential provisions of the Constitution of the United States, I would say to her, when she knocks for admission, "no, we cannot make a constitution for you; we will not impose a constitution upon you against your will, and in opposition to your wishes; but we will keep you out of the Union until you form such a constitution as shall justify us in admitting you into it." The power to impose conditions upon States asking for admission has been expressly recognized during this session of Congress in the case of Kansas. All sides recognize the power, and all, unless I except the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] who has disclaimed the power, are ready to exercise it whenever a proper case arises. The power to admit implies the power to reject, or to say on what terms we will admit.

Then, the question directly arises at this point, whether this provision in the Minnesota constitution is in violation of the Constitution of the United States? And I believe that turns entirely, in the estimation of both the gentlemen to whom I have referred, upon the construction of the term "people of the United States." It is claimed by the gentleman from Virginia, and by the gentleman from Maryland, that the term "people of the United States," in the preamble of the Constitution, and in section two of the first article, is synonymous with the term "citizen of the United States," and that they mean one and the same thing. I believe both of those gentlemen cited the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott decision. Chief Justice Taney says expressly that they are synonymous. But I do not regard that, by any means, as the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, for I do not understand how that question ever came before them. That case, as we all know—at least as all lawyers know—is filled up with opinions and dicta, and with political speculations upon various questions before the country, which it was unnecessary to give. Their motives I do not undertake to inquire into; but no more weight is due to those opinions and dicta than if those who gave them were at the bar of the Supreme Court, instead of being upon the bench. The opinion upon this point is as contradictory as it was uncalled for. It says, on page 404:

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing."

And on the very next page I find it declaring:

"It does not by any means follow, because he has all the rights and privileges of a citizen of a State, that he must be a citizen of the United States." * * * "Nor have the several States surrendered the power of conferring these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each State may still confer them upon an alien, or any one it thinks proper."

Thereby plainly contradicting their own position; for I admit that, if the House of Representatives are to be chosen alone by the citizens of the several States, "the electors in each State" must be citizens.

But I do not rely upon the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States for my construction of the Federal Constitution. And I may say further, as we hear day after day the opinions of the Supreme Court quoted in the Congress of the United States, and are called upon from day to day to conform our opinions upon political questions to theirs, that I do not regard them as authority on any political question. I claim that as I have taken the same oath to support the Constitution of the United States that they have taken, in all cases within my official duty I am bound to interpret the Constitution as I understand it. I will respect, I will give great weight to, the opinions of the higher courts of any State, and especially of the United States; and, so far as my judgment and my obligation to my oath will permit me, I will respect and conform to their opinions; but when I reflect that the Supreme Court, or its judges upon the circuit, sanctioned the alien and sedition laws, that it sustained the constitutionality of the United States Bank, and that it has sanctioned every other usurpation of power by the Federal Government, I must be false to all my convictions if I yield those opinions to the convictions of men who have no more right to construe the Constitution for me as a legislator than I have for them as judges.

"We, the people of the United States," is the language of the preamble. Now, what does it mean? Does it mean citizens of the United States alone? If so, why was not the term "citizens" used? When a specific class is intended, language should be used that applies to that class alone, and in this the Constitution is always clear and specific. But here a term is used that does not apply to individuals; that describes no person, or class of persons, but is altogether general and collective in its character.

But, to come to a correct conclusion as to the meaning of the term, we must look at the circumstances under which the Constitution was adopted. In looking at them I find that in the Constitution of the United States a new principle was inaugurated; and that was the principle of popular instead of State sovereignty. The old Articles of Confederation were adopted by the States, and unless a new idea was to be incorporated into the Constitution of the United States, the language would probably have been, "we, the United States," or, "we, the several States composing the United States," do ordain so and so, or the introduction or preamble of the Articles of Confederation would have been retained. But, as it was designed to make a Government as well as Federation; as direct relations were to be instituted between that Government and the people, and as it was to be the creature of the people of the United States, instead of the States in their corporate or sovereign capacity, the term "people" was, with great propriety, used. The use or meaning of words is often known, or made more clear, by their opposites. Citizen is opposed to alien. "The people," in a political sense, is opposed to the Legislature or the Government. Thus, a constitution may not be adopted by the Legislature; but must be by the people, either in convention assembled, or by popular vote; and as the new Federal Constitution was not to be alone a league; but also, for certain purposes, a Government, it was fit that it should emanate from the people of the States and not from the State governments, and for that the term was used. The term "people" has a legal meaning, and is contradistinguished from the term "State," or "Legislature of a State," as clearly appears in section two, article first, of the Constitution, which says that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of Representatives chosen every second year by the people of the several States."

Now, it must be borne in mind that in the debates in the convention, there was no question which agitated it more than whether the Congress of the United States should represent the States in their sovereign capacity, and the members of Congress be appointed by the Legislatures of the States, or whether they should represent the people of the several States, and be elected by the people. And upon that question there was a compromise, which ended the controversy. It was determined that the Lower House, as so named it, should be chosen by the people of the several States, while the Senate should be chosen by the Legislatures of the several States. Hence the term "people" is simply opposed to the "Legislature," or to the State in its sovereign capacity. It has no other legal meaning, and no other specific meaning. The term "citizen" refers to the individuals. That has a specific and clear meaning. The term "inhabitant" is also specific, and refers to individuals, but "the people" applies not to individuals; it describes no particular class, but is a collective term, and is applied to the mass of inhabitants in their collective capacity, as opposed to the sovereignty or State itself, or Legislature of the State. And I believe that this is the construction that has been uniformly given to it.

I have never yet known an attempt on the part of the Federal Government, since the formation of the Constitution, to dictate to any State whom it shall admit to the privilege of electors. Now, if the term "people of the several States" means the same thing as "citizens of the several States," I admit that the gentleman's inference is legitimate; but, holding that the term has no such definite meaning; that it has no relation to individuals, but is simply used as opposed to the State itself, or to the Legislature of the State, then, of course, this argument falls to the ground.

If this argument be fallacious; if this phrase does not confine the privilege of electors to citizens of the United States, where is there in the Constitution any grant of power whatever to Congress to determine who shall be electors? I take this to be sound Democratic as well as constitutional doctrine, that wherever a power is not granted to the Federal Government, it is reserved to the States or the people thereof; and I find in that instrument no phrase or clause which, by implication even, can give to Congress the power to decide who shall be electors. The whole argument of the gentleman goes on the assumption that the power to decide the manner in which aliens shall become citizens, gives the power to decide the terms upon which they shall be electors.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I say that none but citizens of the United States can participate in this Government; but I say it devolves on the several States to declare who of her citizens shall exercise the right of suffrage; and that there is no power or authority which can interfere with that. But what I maintain is, that they must be citizens.

Mr. BLISS. I get the gentleman's idea; and it is precisely the idea to which I intended to refer. I want to know how the gentleman knows that no person but a citizen of the United States can participate in the Government of the United States? Who is to decide that question? The Constitution certainly does not decide it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I tried my best to show the ground on which I stand. I say that, in the creation of this Government, it was formed by the people of the United States, for the people of the United States, and for no other people in the world.

Mr. BLISS. I cannot give way for a repetition of the gentleman's argument. I undertook to get the gentleman's reasons; and, if I understood him, he must have assumed the ground which I state, that none but citizens of the United States can participate in the Government of the United States; and that Congress is to determine who are citizens of the United States, and therefore may decide who shall participate in the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I said that the Congress of the United States alone had the right to say who, of foreign birth, shall be citizens of the United States, but not who of the native born. They have nothing to do with that.

Mr. BLISS. Of course not; I did not mean to insinuate that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this question of citizenship, and what constitutes citizenship, I find just about as much confusion in the minds of gentlemen here as there seems to be in the country at large. There is, as the gentleman has correctly said, no such thing as citizenship of the United States, in itself considered. The citizens of the several States are citizens of the United States; and the States themselves must determine who shall be citizens thereof, with the single exception in regard to foreigners; and as to that exception, I have stated that the United States have the power to direct the mode and manner by which foreigners shall become citizens of the several States. I believe that in that I agree with the gentleman from Virginia; but the inference which I understood him to make is, that the Federal Government has not only the power to say what foreigners shall be citizens, but also the power to say what foreigners shall be electors; and he says that on the assumption that citizens are electors, or that electors must necessarily be citizens, or else there is no logic in the argument.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman from Virginia has made an argument of an hour long; and I could only infer his ideas from the argument.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have stated repeatedly that it is for Congress alone to say who, of foreign birth, shall be citizens; but it does not follow that those of foreign birth who are citizens shall exercise all the high rights of citizens; because the Constitution says that they shall not be members of this House unless they have been citizens of the United States seven years; that they shall not be members of the Senate unless they have been citizens of the United States for nine years; and that they shall not be eligible for the office of President or Vice President at all.

Mr. BLISS. That is a repetition of what the gentleman said before. I understand that the arguments of both the gentlemen have been that because Congress may determine the rules by which aliens may become citizens of the States, therefore no aliens can be electors who have not been made citizens according to those rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is the right doctrine, of course.

Mr. BLISS. In order to make that inference, the gentleman must treat the term "elector" and the term "citizen" as nearly, at least, synonymous. Now, I hold that a man may be a citizen of the United States and not an elector, and that he does not deny. I hold that, although a certain class of citizens are electors, yet, as terms, they are entirely independent of each other. Native women and children are citizens; and an alien woman may be as well naturalized and become a citizen of the United States as a man. The terms have no necessary relation to each other; and because one is a citizen, he is not, therefore, an elector; or, because he is an elector, he is not, therefore, a citizen. Therein, I think, is the point of departure and difference between us.

Now, while the Federal Government has the jurisdiction to decide the manner in which aliens may become citizens of the several States, have they hence the power to decide what aliens, or whether any at all, may or may not become electors in the States? It could not have that power, directly or indirectly, unless there is that intimate and close connection between the two terms which certainly does not exist. Not only that—not only is there no express grant—not only is there no power given to Congress to decide who, either of aliens or citizens, shall be electors; but the power is, by necessary inference, reserved to the States. It is reserved by the general reservation of all powers not granted, and also by the language of the second section of article one, from which I read:

"The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Now, what is the natural, the plain, and necessary inference from that language? It is admitted—for the provision is express—that all who may vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature shall be qualified to vote for members of the House of Representatives. But what power is to decide who may thus vote? Here is a matter within the State entirely; here is a question on which there were regulations at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution within each of the original States of the Union. Each State had decided who should be electors; and, in changing their constitutions from time to time, each State continued to decide "the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." Some required them to be citizens of the United States, and some did not; and, instead of there being a uniform rule as to the qualifications of such electors, either as applied to citizens or aliens, the rule varied to suit the policy of each State; and all that the Constitution of the United States has to do with, is to refer it to the States in the manner I have shown. It seems to me that if there is any force in language, this matter is perfectly clear and unmistakable. I can see it in no other light.

The gentleman from Maryland referred to an elaborate argument of Mr. Calhoun upon this subject. I have examined it, and find that it contains the same fundamental error that pervades all the views upon that side of the question. It is very easy to prove that a State cannot make of an alien a citizen, and for the simple reason that jurisdiction upon this subject is yielded to Congress. The arguments upon that subject are mere wasted strength. A citizen of a State is necessarily a citizen of the United States. He is made so by the express language of the Constitution. As to all but aliens, the States determine citizenship; while aliens can become citizens only in the mode prescribed by Congress. Upon this, there is no dispute. But when it is assumed that only citizens can be made electors, I demand the proof. Jurisdiction over the qualification of electors is not granted to Congress, either as to aliens or others; and I demand the evidence to show that the States are at all restrained in this regard. Because Congress may prescribe rules of naturalization, may it therefore pass upon the qualification of electors?

But the inference that none but citizens can be made electors is sought to be drawn from the inconveniences, the impropriety of granting the elective franchise to aliens. I admit the impropriety. The arguments of gentlemen are clear and forcible, and would probably have been convincing had they been made in the proper forum. But are we to assume jurisdiction to decide matters reserved to the States, because they so often decide wrong? The attempted demonstration is not a reductio ad absurdum, as the gentleman from Maryland claimed, but a reductio ad incommodum, which proves nothing. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] calls this federal doctrine. It is not federal—it is ultra-consolidation. And if we are to infer powers on such grounds as these, I know not what power we may not infer. We are running a race of consolidation; and I will oppose any step in that downward direction.

I base my dissent, then, from the position of the gentleman from Virginia, first, upon the ground that there is no grant in the Constitution to the Federal Government to decide who shall be the electors; but, on the other hand, there is a provision in the Constitution that those persons shall be the electors who are electors within the several States, clearly implying, independent of the want of a grant, that the States themselves shall make provision upon the subject.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The fault of the gentleman consists in this: that the Constitution assumed that there would be none but citizens in the States who would exercise the right of suffrage. They could not suppose it possible that any but citizens would compose the Legislature that were to elect the Senators to represent the sovereignty of the States. It was impossible to suppose that an electoral body could be formed who would not send men who were citizens of the United States to the Legislatures that had the great duty to perform of electing Senators to represent their sovereignty in the Federal Senate. The gentleman talks of certain things being assumed, and that is one of them.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman is rather long in his interruptions; and, if I understand the purport of what he last said, it is a strained assumption so far as language, and the legal effect of language, is concerned, and not a very good historical one.

In opposition to the assumption of the gentleman, we have the fact which has been alluded to here to-day by the gentleman's colleague, that in the State of Virginia itself persons have been electors, down to quite a recent period, who were not citizens of the United States. In the States of Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Illinois, also, the construction which I give to the Constitution has been given to it, and by their original constitutions electors were not necessarily citizens of the State, and hence of the United States. We have also the fact that, in the State of Ohio, the former constitution was ambiguous on that subject, and under its provisions, as interpreted in some parts of the State, aliens were allowed to vote, while they were forbidden to vote in other parts. The ambiguity was afterwards remedied by an act of the Legislature.

Mr. HARLAN. And also by a modification of the constitution.

Mr. BLISS. There was another point made by my colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who opposes the admission of Minnesota under this constitution, on which I will say a single word. It relates entirely to the irregularities in the choice of that constitution. Well, now, if we were to pass upon the propriety or even upon the decency of the action of the people of Minnesota in forming this constitution, I would shut her out until she should come with decency and order and ask for admission; but, as I understand our duty in that respect, it is not material whether the constitution was framed by a regular, legal body or not. That has never been deemed material. That is a question that never has been asked. It was not asked in the case of California nor in that of Kansas.

I believe that the perfect regularity in writing out and formation of constitutions has never been required in any State in the Union; but the question has been, when a constitution proper in itself has been brought to Congress, whether it is the voice of the people of the Territory? whether they have ratified it? And, notwithstanding the conduct of the convention purporting to represent the people in this case, yet the subsequent vote of the people, almost unanimously accepting the constitution, and requesting to be admitted under that constitution, cures all these irregularities; and she comes with her own clean hands, and knocks at our door. The question now is, shall we admit her? shall we admit her with a constitution fair upon its face, which does not violate the Constitution of the United States? which protects the fundamental rights of man? or shall we turn her out because of irregularities in framing it—gross, indeed, but cured by the people—and because of imperfections not fundamental in their character?

There were other grounds upon which he also based his opposition, which I will not now discuss. As a citizen of Ohio I feel some responsibility for the irregularities in Minnesota, and for the bad name which they have given her. I see the finger of Ohio politicians in them all, and I feel assured that when we give her the authority and independence of a State, when Presidents can no longer send tricksters to rule over her, she will assume the dignity and decorum of a republican State.

I am not willing to permit gentlemen on the other side of the House to get the credit of exclusive friendship for the State of Minnesota. It is my own State. I have a greater interest in its future glory than any gentleman on the other side of the House can have—that is, upon the supposition that there can be any diversity of interest in the matter, which I do not admit; and I do not want my friends to show such a regard for technicalities as to insist upon them to her rejection when this State comes to us asking for admission on the very terms which we held out to her when we passed the enabling act.

I have said all I desired to say upon this subject. I will only add, in conclusion, that, while I differ with some of my friends and colleagues in my conclusions, in reference to this matter, I differ from them with great reluctance. I listened with great attention to the argument of my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day. I know him to be a high-minded man. I know that there can be no motives which actuate his conduct in this matter but motives of devotion to his duty to the country. And although this sense of duty has led him to separate from me on this question of admitting Minnesota into the Union, yet I shall accord to him the same high respect which I claim for my own motives.

And then, on motion of Mr. CURTIS, (at twelve minutes to six o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 7, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. T. N. HASKELL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. MASON presented the credentials of Hon. THOMAS L. CLINGMAN, appointed by the Governor of the State of North Carolina a Senator from that State, to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature, the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. ASA BIGGS. The credentials were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. CLINGMAN, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 7, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As the House will probably not be in session to-morrow, I suggest that by unanimous consent the business set apart for twelve o'clock to-morrow, the Minnesota bill, shall stand over, and be set apart for twelve o'clock Tuesday.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Monday is suspension day, and I do not want to interfere with that.

No objection was made to the arrangement.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me a single moment, I desire to say, that having had the honor of receiving a commission from the Governor of North Carolina to fill a position at the other end of the Capitol, I have this day written to him announcing my resignation as a member of the House; and I present now, in order that it may go upon the Journal, a note to you announcing the same fact.

I hope gentlemen will allow me to say further, that during my service in this House, which has been considerable, extending over a dozen years or more, I have no doubt I may many times have wounded the feelings of gentlemen in our struggles here, and during this present session I may have given offense to some gentlemen by objecting to their motions, and insisting upon the regular order of business. I beg leave to say that in every single instance I have been actuated by no feeling of unkindness towards the particular member. I have been governed solely by what I thought a sense of duty; and if, at any time, in throwing obstacles in the way of gentlemen, I have done anything unpleasant to them, I hope they will attribute it not to any personal unkindness on my part, but solely to the reason which I have given. And if, at any time in our discussions here—for I have been impulsive and hasty—I have ever made a remark which was offensive to any gentleman, it was quite unintentional. In leaving the House, I do it without any unkind feeling towards a single member, and with many regrets.

Mr. CLINGMAN's letter of resignation was then read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 7, 1858.

SIR: I beg leave to notify you and the members of the House of Representatives, that I have this day sent to the Governor of North Carolina my resignation as a member of this House, to take effect to-day.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOMAS L. CLINGMAN.

HON. JAMES L. ORR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BRANCH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I have certainly no objection to the adjournment, but I want to see if we cannot come to some agreement by which we shall have the same order on some other day that we should have had to-day. This was probably the last objection day that we should have had this session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will submit a motion, and that it will be received by unanimous consent, that next Friday and Saturday shall be devoted to private bills; and shall be considered as objection days.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let that question come up at the regular time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from New York, that on Monday he may be enabled to suspend the rules and thus accomplish the object he has in view.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well, sir, I am willing to trust to that; but I thought we might come to some agreement by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANCH's motion was then agreed to; and the House (at twenty minutes after eleven o'clock, a. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 8, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR EVANS.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. President, it is my painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of my venerable friend and colleague, JOSIAH J. EVANS, who died most unexpectedly on the evening of the 6th instant, of disease of the heart. He was in the Senate during the entire session of that day. He afterwards dined with me, and sat at table by your side. He came before the appointed hour, to avoid the storm that threatened, and throughout the evening was very cheerful, and seemed more than usually disposed to join in conversation; and when I assisted him with his overcoat, and attended him to his carriage, I thought that he was entirely recovered from the indisposition from which he had suffered more or less during the winter, and that many years of green old age remained for him yet. Scarcely, however, had an hour elapsed before I was stunned by the intelligence that he was no more, and hastening to his residence, I found him dead. Never before, in my experience, have I so fully realized that "in the midst of life we are in death."

Mr. EVANS was born in South Carolina, and was one of the earliest graduates of her then infant college. He was of the class of 1803. He was educated to the bar, where he soon rose to eminence. At an early age he was sent to the Legislature, and shortly after was made solicitor of his circuit, which post he held until 1830, when he was elevated to the bench. He continued there until he was, in 1852, chosen by the State of South Carolina to represent her on this floor. He has filled every station he has occupied with untiring industry, scrupulous fidelity, and distinguished ability, and to the entire satisfaction of his State.

Without any pretensions to brilliancy of parts, he had a strong and clear intellect, a full mind, and a sound, discriminating judgment; and these capacities, joined with steadiness of purpose and the most conscientious integrity, made him, in my opinion, one of the wisest and best men I ever knew. His manners, sedate and dignified, were so tempered by a polished urbanity, an unvarying cheerfulness, and unaffected kindness, as to conciliate the thorough respect of all, and the devoted attachment of those who knew him well.

Mr. EVANS was born on the 27th of November, 1786, and was therefore more than seventy-one years of age, and had been, until recently, blessed with uniform and robust health. He had lived his full three score years and ten, and few have lived them better or enjoyed them more; for with a fond family and ample fortune, he was, in all his private as well as public relations, without blemish or reproach, and in South Carolina had ever only to indicate the position he desired to occupy, whether in society, in his profession, or in affairs, to have it accorded to him at once.

I have known Mr. EVANS long, and have known him intimately, and since I have been in this Senate our relations have been so close and cordial that his sudden loss makes me disconsolate. In this feeling I am sure that I have the sympathy of every Senator. I believe I may say, with perfect truth, that no Senator enjoyed, to a greater extent than my lamented colleague, the respect, the esteem, the confidence, and, I may add, the affection of this body, and of all who are connected with it. He was a man who, though full of manliness, never had an enemy; and throughout the length and breadth of our little State, into whose high places the arrows of death have, of late, flown so frequent, every heart will be saddened by this dispensation of Providence.

Allow me, Mr. President, to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the Hon. JOSIAH J. EVANS, deceased, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, will go into mourning for the residue of the present session, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the deceased from the Senate Chamber at two o'clock to-day; and that the committee of arrangements, consisting of Messrs. HUNTER, BIGLER, FOSTER, TOOMBS, BROVY, and BRANT, superintend the same.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The feeling and eloquent tribute that has just been rendered to the memory of our departed brother has awakened sensibilities which I fear will be jarred by anything I can hope to say: yet, sir, having been thought worthy of an invitation to join in these sad rites, I pray you for a moment's indulgence whilst I lay an humble offering on the grave around which we are gathered.

It is literally but yesterday that the seat before me was filled by the venerable form of Carolina's senior Senator: to-day Carolina mourns his loss; the electric messenger has done its work, and the friends of his home are even now mingling their grief with ours: recalling, as we are, the affecting words with which so lately he lamented, on the death of his late colleague, that the inexorable fiat had stricken down the vigorous tree, and left unscathed the withered remnants of the decaying trunk.

Sad, indeed, have been the recent bereavements which it has pleased Providence to inflict upon the native State of him we mourn. The awe-stricken heart of the nation was still throbbing heavily in unison with hers for the loss of her preëminent son, when on my taking my seat in this body I learned to know and to love, both the colleague and the almost immediate successor of John C. Calhoun. A few short years have elapsed, and where is now the beaming eye of Andrew Pickens Butler? Where his genial presence, his ringing voice, his manly bearing, his whole being, stamped as it was with the seal of honor, the impress of true nobility of soul? Broken-hearted at the loss of his gallant kinsman, he has sunk into the tomb: to which, with shaken frame and streaming eyes he had followed the lamented Brooks. Hamilton, too, the chivalrous, the warm-hearted, the eloquent Hamilton, sleeps beneath the deep waters of the southern gulf. And now, now, EVANS, the crude judge, the honored Senator, the soul of truth, who loved justice for the sake of justice, truth for the sake of truth, he, too, is to be borne to the last common resting place of man; and amongst us, the place that has known him shall know him no more.

This is not the time nor the place for a calm and measured analysis of those intellectual and moral qualities which won for JOSIAH J. EVANS the proud distinction of being selected by his native State as worthy to fill the seat once occupied by her Calhoun. Yet it is not alien to the feelings natural on such an occasion that affection should revert to the traits peculiarly characteristic of the deceased, and fondly seek to stamp upon the memory all that can preserve a vivid image of him who has left us forever.

Whence, then, arose that respectful and affectionate reverence with which his presence was ever greeted by us all? Judge EVANS was no orator. Not his were any of those impassioned appeals to the national heart with which the genius of a Clay carried captive in his train all within reach of the magic of his voice. He has left for the admiration and instruction of posterity none of those magnificent orations which won for the great Senator from Massachusetts the title of the American Demosthenes; nor did he bring into the councils of the nation that profound and philosophical insight into the science of government, that marvelous capacity for analysis, that acute discrimination, that vigorous logic, that sagacious, almost prophetic, statesmanship which so greatly distinguished Carolina's illustrious son. Yet, in another, and though humbler, perhaps not less useful sphere, he fully merited the honor with which he had been crowned by his State.

Born at a period when triumphant fortune was crowning the heroes of the Revolution with the laurels of victorious battle; nurtured in the midst of those convulsive throes that preceded the birth of the institutions under which we live; surrounded by men whose names are illustrated in our history, not more by their value in the field than by their virtues as patriots and their merits as statesmen, he early imbibed those lofty principles of virtue and of honor which he so eminently exhibited in his public career. These first impressions of his childhood were implanted in a genial soil: they grew with his growth, and strengthened with his strength: they remained indelibly stamped upon his character, and seemed even by some subtle mystery of nature, to have molded his features with the very image of integrity and honor.

From the associations by which his youth was surrounded, arose in him that profound reverence for the sturdy virtues of our ancestors, that deep and abiding sense of their services to the country, which ever rendered him the ready, zealous, and effective champion of their claims on the justice as well as the gratitude of the nation.

So well, indeed, were his feelings and predilections understood by us all, that he was at once, by spontaneous consent, designated to the chairmanship of our Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and we all know that his onerous duties in that office were to him a labor of love down to the very moment when the impulses of his generous heart were arrested by the cold hand of death.

His long judicial career in his native State had so matured his judgment; the progress of advancing years had so enlarged his experience; his love for his whole country was so deeply implanted in his very nature, that it was impossible for him to degenerate into the mere partisan; whilst his political convictions were too deeply settled, his devotion to the true principles of the Constitution too profound, to permit him to regard with indifference the dangerous and exciting sectional contests which filled his declining years with anxious solicitude for the fate of the country he had loved so well and served so faithfully.

Let us thank God that his last moments were cheered by the conviction that the imminence of the danger had passed away, that the lowering clouds had parted, that the fair, blue sky again gave promise of calm and of sunshine, and that bright rays of hope gilded the dying couch of the departed patriot.

• Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is rarely that I have allowed myself to mingle my voice with those whom duty or affection has prompted on occasions like these to pay a passing tribute to departed worth; but the circumstances of this occasion are such that I cannot permit it to pass in silence. When I first met Judge EVANS in the Senate, he realized to my mind more fully than any other man whom it has ever been my fortune to meet on this floor the ideal which I had formed in youth of an old Roman Senator. There was a calm and quiet dignity in his demeanor, and an exact justice in all that he did, which fully realized the expectations we naturally form of the character of a Senator.

It was my fortune, serving upon a committee with him during the last Congress, to know him well. Although he came from a section of the country that has been supposed to represent political views antagonistical to those with which my humble name has been associated, I may be permitted to say that I have never known a man who more deeply regretted the asperities and recriminations engendered by political contentions; and there was no man who by the amenity and suavity of his manner, the kindness of his heart, and the genial nature of his temper, did more to counteract and discourage them.

Sir, he was eminently a just and a kind man; in the benevolence of his heart he embraced all, of every section, and every quarter of the country. With all that, sir, there was joined in him a modesty and a distrust of his own judgment, amounting almost to weakness; by which he would sometimes be induced, perhaps, to surrender the calm and clear convictions of an honest and upright mind, to what might be expected of him from the associations with which he was politically connected. But, even in that, I think Judge EVANS never suffered his ideas of right and truth, and what was due to a patriotic and faithful discharge of his duty, to lose their control over his judgment.

Sir, although this is an occasion for sober and serious reflection, to my mind it is not one for deep grief or sorrow. An old man, who had already passed his three score and ten, and had entered upon that four-score of which the inspired Psalmist tells us "its strength is but labor and sorrow," has passed away; like a shock of corn, fully ripe, full of years and of honors, in a green old age. By a kind dispensation of Providence, at once he has been summoned from the field of his labors, to that of his reward.

Mr. WILSON. My heart prompts me, Mr. President, to add a few poor words to those which have been so fitly spoken, as a tribute of respect and of affection to the character and the memory of an honored associate and a cherished friend. Death has come into this Chamber with startling and appalling suddenness, teaching us all the mournful and impressive lessons which it has been repeating for six thousand years. We are summoned again to pause, to turn aside from the pressing duties of public life, and pay the last sad tribute of respect and affection to a fallen comrade. Often have Senators been summoned to perform these sad offices; but I am sure, Mr. President, that on no occasion have we ever been called upon to pay the last tribute of respect to one more truly and sincerely respected and beloved.

During the present session, I have served upon the Committee on Revolutionary Claims of which our departed associate was chairman. I have spent with him in that committee room many hours devoted to business, and to the exchange of ideas and opinions upon a variety of topics of a public and private nature. While we both entertained opinions with the tenacity of sincere conviction, I ever found him kind, charitable, liberal, and tolerant to others. The exacting duties devolving upon him in that committee were great, although not of that class which take prominence in the Senate Chamber. He brought to their discharge the most conscientious fidelity. He had studied all the laws and decisions bearing upon the cases that came before that committee, and was perfectly familiar with them. While he watched over the Treasury with scrupulous care, he was ever ready to do justice to claimants, whether they came from his own South Carolina or from other and distant States. The claims of the men of my own commonwealth were as sure to receive his careful attentions as were the claims of the sons of his own section of the Union. He was ever, in the committee room, the embodiment of conscientiousness, fidelity, justice, and kindness.

Sir, in that committee room I learned to appreciate his character even more fully than I had here in the open Senate Chamber: I learned to respect, to admire, and to love him. During all the exciting scenes which have transpired here since I came into this body—scenes which will long linger in our memories—we maintained our personal relations of friendship unbroken; and the many acts of kindness I have received from him I shall not cease to remember until the heart upon which they are engraven shall forever cease to beat.

He will soon rest, Mr. President, beneath the soil of his own native State, which he loved so well and served so faithfully. That State has given to the Councils of the Republic many not undistinguished sons; but the sods which will lie on his bosom will press on the heart of as pure, as conscientious, as honest a public servant as she ever gave to the service of the nation. Let the people of his native South Carolina, let the personal friends who have known him long and loved him well, let the sorrowing mourners around his now clouded hearthstone, be cheered in this hour of affliction by the assurance that we, the representatives of sister Commonwealths—we, his associates and friends in this Chamber, will ever revere his name and cherish his memory with affectionate regard.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER the Senate took a recess until two o'clock, p. m., the hour fixed for the funeral services.

The Senate reassembled at two o'clock, p. m.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had resolved to attend in a body the funeral of the Hon. JOSIAH J. EVANS.

The corpse, attended by the pall-bearers and the committee of arrangements, was removed from the room of the Vice President, in which it had lain since an early hour this morning, to the area in the center of the Senate Chamber, where seats were provided for the remaining Senator and the Representatives of the State of South Carolina. The diplomatic corps, the judges and officers of the Supreme Court of the United States, the President of the United States, the heads of the various Departments, and the members of the House of Representatives, preceded by their Speaker and officers, entered the Senate Chamber at intervals and were conducted to the seats assigned to them.

The Rev. G. D. Cummins, D. D., commenced the funeral services by reading from the ritual of the Episcopal church portions appropriate to the occasion—"I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord." The Rev. George W. Samson read the epistle, 1st Corinthians, sixteenth chapter: "Now is Christ risen from the dead;" and the Rev. George D. Cummins delivered a discourse from the text, 2d Timothy, first chapter, tenth verse: "Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." The Rev. George W. Samson closed the ceremonies by an impressive prayer, and the funeral procession left the Senate Chamber, to convey the body to the place of interment, in the following order:

The Chaplains of Congress for the occasion.
The Physicians who attended the deceased.

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS:

Mr. Hunter,	Mr. Toombs,
Mr. Bigler,	Mr. Brown,
Mr. Foster,	Mr. Bright.

PALL-BEARERS.

Mr. Fitzpatrick,	Mr. Crittenden,
Mr. Mason,	Mr. Allen,

DECEASE OF HON. JOSIAH J. EVANS.

A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, communicating the proceedings of the Senate on the occasion of the death of HON. JOSIAH J. EVANS, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina; which were read by the Clerk, as follows: •

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 8, 1853.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the Hon. JOSIAH J. EVANS, deceased, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, will go into mourning for the residue of the present session by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the deceased from the Senate Chamber, at two o'clock to day; and that the committee of arrangements, consisting of Messrs. HUNTER, BIGLER, FOSTER, TOOMBS, BROWN, and BRIGHT, superintend the same.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

Attest: ASBURY DICKINS, Secretary.

Mr. McQUEEN. Mr. Speaker, it is with feelings of much more than ordinary pain I rise to announce the death of my honorable friend, JOSIAH J. EVANS, Senator from the State of South Carolina; who died at his residence in this city, at about a quarter to eleven on Thursday evening, the 6th instant, of an affection of the heart, under which he labored for some time past, but not so seriously as to excite, even with his most intimate friends and associates, any great apprehension of this sudden, sorrowful event; for within one hour of his death, no human eye could perceive that the afflictive hand of Providence was upon him; though within half that time his spirit took its flight to regions of bliss, while nothing remained in the presence of his ardent and devoted friends who surrounded him but his cold and lifeless corpse.

Judge EVANS was born in the District of Marlborough, in the State of South Carolina, on the 27th November, 1786, and in the immediate vicinity of his present residence. He was descended of Welch parents, who settled on the Pee Dee river in the early settlement of that part of the country. He graduated in the South Carolina college at Columbia, in the year 1808, in a distinguished class of thirty, of whom but three survive him. Not long afterwards he engaged in the practice of the law, in which profession he so commanded the esteem and confidence of his countrymen that he was soon honored with a seat in the State Legislature. In that body he manifested such capacity for business and high legal attainments, that he was early elected by the Legislature solicitor, or States attorney, for the judicial circuit in which he lived, in which capacity he served for many years; and while he was still continuing to discharge the duties of that office, he was elected by the Legislature to fill the office of judge of the highest courts of law known to the judicature of South Carolina.

About the year 1830 he assumed the responsible duties of this distinguished office, in which he continued—having the highest confidence of the citizens of his State in his strict sense of justice, his patient and earnest pursuit after truth, his well-balanced judgment, and, indeed, all the attributes which adorn the bench—until December, 1852, when he was again honored by his State, and transferred to a seat in the Senate of the United States, of which he died a member. Thus showing a period of upwards of fifty years, of the life of this great and good man, devoted to the service of his State and country, without a broken link in that long chain of usefulness and honor, and that, too, without one stained spot, or the shadow of a spot, upon his official or moral character.

Of the earlier part of Judge EVANS's official conduct I can say nothing, of my own personal knowledge. I found him, in my youth, in the last years of his services in the office of solicitor, and can bear my humble testimony to the character which he universally sustained, that whilst he was able and faithful in the discharge of his duties, he always took care that the accused should have impartial justice.

As a judge, I do not feel adequate to the task of awarding him his due; but I can safely say that few men, if any, combined within themselves more of the elements essential to the character of a great and good judge than this distinguished man.

In the dispassionate and deliberate investigation of cases, in the calm and earnest search after truth, which he always sought out with singular energy and ability, he had no superior. Once arrived at truth, he was inflexible as he was just; and his justice was always tempered with mercy.

Of his services in the Senate of the United States I might well let the record of his country speak, but will simply say that, though comparatively unaccustomed to the conflicts of legislation, yet, none were more faithful, none more conscientious, and none more capable of forming a correct judgment upon any and every subject which was presented to him for his investigation and action; and I may say further, that, without ostentation, he searched for the path of his duty as a patriot, and having found it, pursued it, without regard to the opinions of others.

His educational attainments were by no means confined to his profession; he was a student to the day of his death, and few men can boast of such general intelligence and information; though, such was his modest and retiring nature, that none but those who had familiar intercourse with him, could properly appreciate him in this respect.

But nothing which may be said of him, in his public career, can surpass that which is due him in his private relations; of these, as his neighbor and friend, I may venture to speak. Although engaged so long in public duties, yet in the intervals allowed him, he pursued his interests as a planter, and the adornment and comfort of his homestead, with that same untiring energy and judgment which so eminently characterized him throughout his life.

As a neighbor, he was honest, benevolent, kind, and generous, and his death will create a vacuum which will not easily be filled while memory lasts; as a master, he was lenient, kind, and humane. But of all his moral excellence and virtues, there was none so prominent as that of his love and devotion to his family. As a husband and father, he was most kind, assiduous, and affectionate, exercising in a refined degree that urbanity, mingled with his affection, which always distinguished him in his intercourse with the world.

He leaves a family of four sons and a daughter, fit representatives of a noble father, to mourn his sorrowful and irreparable loss, upon whom this sad and sudden affliction will fall most heavily.

A few years before he was elected to the Senate of the United States, he was bereaved of his amiable and excellent wife; an affliction which he bore with that meek and patient resignation which characterizes the Christian.

His religious creed was of the Episcopal faith. He was a regular attendant of that Church, and a large contributor to its annual support; whilst he always manifested the most liberal consideration and respect for other denominations.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus endeavored, in my humble way, to pay this brief tribute to the memory of my departed friend. He has been my neighbor and friend from my boyhood; and I have always found him as I have attempted to describe him; and believing as I do with the poet, that—

“An honest man 's the noblest work of God,”

I may not be censured when I express my confident belief that the spirit of this great and good man has winged its way to bliss with God, whose name was the last word he uttered on earth.

I submit, for the adoption of the House, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of the Hon. JOSIAH J. EVANS, a Senator in Congress from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House, in relation to the death of the Hon. JOSIAH J. EVANS, be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That this House will, as a body, repair to the Senate Chamber to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Mr. BOCOCK. I rise to second the resolutions which have just been offered, and to bear my humble testimony to the virtues and merits of the honored dead. I shall attempt no narration of the particular incidents in the life of Judge EVANS. That has already been fully and ably done. I shall speak of his general character, and of some of the lessons which may be deduced from his life and his death. I shall speak of him in a spirit of simplicity and sincerity; for such a spirit best befits not only the solemnity of the occasion, but also the character of the deceased. His nature was free from extravagance and excess. Its elements were so evenly mixed up, and all were tempered with so just and equable a spirit, that the contemplation of its outlines repels and rebukes every disposition to exaggeration.

I am sure that I shall have the cordial assent of every man who knew him, when I say that Judge EVANS was a good man. He had a just appreciation of the obligations of life, personal, social, and political; and he sought faithfully and diligently to discharge them all; and this is the highest meed of praise that can be bestowed on man. But no man in high position can be truly a good man without being also, to a considerable extent, a great man. For what knowledge is so important as a knowledge of duty, and what achievement so worthy as its successful performance? Judge EVANS's greatness was not the greatness of excited effort, or of showy and striking action. It was the greatness of doing well whatever circumstances required at his hand. The calm dignity of conscious strength, a quick and a clear apprehension of right, a judgment serene and unclouded amidst the most exciting events—these are the leading attributes of his character, these the solid elements of his greatness. The thought has often struck me, however fanciful it may appear to others, that I discovered in his person a striking resemblance to the likenesses which I have seen, of one of the greatest of the worthies of our early history. I allude to Benjamin Franklin. However that may be, his character was certainly fashioned after the same Doric model. There was in both the same strong common sense, the same eminently practical turn of mind, the same disposition to unobtrusive labor; the same comparative disregard of external appearances and the mere conventionalities of life, when in pursuit of the real and the useful. And never was the great value of such qualities, for success in life, more fully illustrated and clearly proven than in the case of Judge EVANS.

Think, if you please, of a young man, of unpretending origin, of a very moderate share of worldly fortune, with no qualities to dazzle the world, or lead captive the fancy of his friends. Place him then in a society where the constant cultivation of high sentiments of honor, of lineage, and greatness have created a nation of cavaliers, with all the lofty spirit and chivalrous feeling of the days of Charlemagne. See him at first contending for a foothold; then calmly moving on amid the jostling throng, and quietly rising higher and higher in the scale of fortune and of rank. See him first a successful lawyer, then a distinguished judge, and finally behold him sitting amid the Senators of the Union, a joint representative, with one other, of the sovereignty of his proud State, and the successor of a Pinckney, a Hayne, a McDuffie, and a Calhoun. Behold this picture, and tell me if you do not recognize the presence of greatness and of power.

I would not be understood as intimating that Judge EVANS was not an accomplished speaker and an able debater. He spoke but seldom, it is true; but in all that he said there was a simplicity of language, a clearness of statement, and an unpretending force of logic, that unerringly mark a strong and vigorous mind. These qualities he certainly had. But it was his strict integrity of purpose, his calm, unbiased judgment, and his strong common sense, that shone most conspicuously as elements of greatness in his character. With all, he has left a fame of which his State may well be proud, which his family and friends may cherish with sacred affection, and which mankind may emulate with profit.

As his life was, so it shall stand forever. His record is made up; his account is closed, and now awaits the impartial judgment of his countrymen and of posterity. He himself is gone, and forever.

He stands now in an assemblage more august than that of Senators and Cabinets, and before a tribunal more just and more certain in its decrees than the public opinion of contemporaries or of posterity. And alas! how sudden was his departure! In the morning, he was engaged in the quiet and faithful discharge of his duties; in the afternoon, he charmed the social circle with the genial brightness of his friendly humor; in the evening—a brief struggle with death—and his immortal spirit wings its flight upward from earth forever.

Death snatched the casket, but the jewel is safe from its grasp. This sudden demise of a member of the Senate, so known, so honored, and so loved, brings us, as it were, face to face with death. We see its relentless hand stretched forth in our midst, we feel its icy breath upon our cheek. Who is ready to meet its encounter? If official position, or extensive usefulness, or great popularity would stay its approach, then Judge Evans would still live. It is well understood, I believe, that he intended, at the end of his existing term of service in the Senate, to retire from public life, and devote himself exclusively to his private affairs and to a fuller preparation for that change which, from his advanced age, he must have known was not very far off.

But death would not stay its hand. It preferred to take him surrounded by all the trappings of official station, and at a time when he least expected the approach. Who, then, determines to be prepared for death to-morrow? How knows he that this day will not close his career on earth?

Nothing could console for the suddenness of Judge Evans's death but the excellence of his life. I have said that he was a good man in the view that he inquired into, and attempted to perform, all his obligations to his fellow-man.

But I have reason to believe that, in a yet holier and better sense, he was a good man, and that he inquired into, and attempted to discharge, his obligations to his God also. If this be true, then how important and valuable is the truth! His friends, then, may have hope in his death, and may cherish the consoling thought, that in this great change, what to them and the country is a great loss, is to him an everlasting gain.

Thus far have I spoken of the death of Judge Evans as an isolated circumstance.

I desire now, as a Virginian, to consider it in another point of view. Within a few years past, how bountifully has devoted Carolina reaped of the "harvest of death." Calhoun and Elmore and Butler and Evans, of the Senate, all gone since I first entered the Halls of Congress, and one also, a member of the House, whose sudden and untimely death a generous people yet deeply mourn. I allude to the lamented Brooks. These were the sons of South Carolina. Their first and highest allegiance was due to her. But they were not all hers.

Their efforts were for the good of every southern State, and for the advancement of the entire country. The whole civilized world is filled with their labors. We claim our share at least in this heritage of sorrow. And now while South Carolina adds another to the urns which she bears in her bosom, and bends her head yet lower in grief, I claim, in the name of her elder sister, Virginia, the bountiful mother of States, to extend to her the hand of sympathy, and mingle my tears of sorrow with hers. When my youthful mind was first turned to public affairs, my attention was arrested by the bright array of great men who then illustrated the State of South Carolina. There was Calhoun and McDuffie and Hayne and Hamilton and Turnbull and Preston, and others, whom I need not name.

One by one those I have mentioned have sunk into the grave—all save one; and he bows his spirit beneath the crushing weight of years and infirmity. South Carolina may well have been proud of her sons. Niobe boasted too proudly of her children, and brought down the vengeance of the gods upon them. But when the children of Niobe were stricken with death, their mother could bear no more, and was doomed to lament their loss throughout all time, and to remain forever

"Childless and crowless in her voiceless woe."

If Carolina was proud overmuch of her mighty sons, and has thus brought down upon them the vengeance of Heaven, she may moderate her grief; because she has yet other sons to come forward in their stead.

When next the mighty conflict of intellect shall be proclaimed, and questions of political and social progress shall wake up the great ones of the earth—then, when the bead-roll of fame shall be called to summon the contestants to the field, Chevis and Lowndes and Calhoun and McDuffie and Elmore and Butler and Evans shall lie mute in the grave. But others shall answer in their stead; for Carolina has yet sons worthy to wear the laurel. Why should they not move on to the highest point of fame? The example of those who have gone before sheds yet a bright light upon their path, and the smiles of a friendly world encourage them to advance. There remains the same proud and gallant State to cherish and sustain them; there remain the same Constitution to protect, the same great principles to maintain, and the same holy rights to defend.

The great men whom I have named, though gone, yet lend their propitious aid. If they were lights on earth, and have seemed to disappear, they are not lost. They have but "gone to join the lights that live along the sky." Their counsels and their teachings are immortal. So, too, of him for whom we sorrow:

"He is not dead.
Sunk though he be beneath the mortal fold.
So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head;
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky."

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. Speaker, when a Senator ripe in the wisdom of years, mild and judicious in counsel, faithful in the performance of duty, and of overflowing kindness in all the relations of life, passes away, and is gathered to his fathers, the State in whose name he spoke, and the nation whose interests he labored to advance, join in a mutual sorrow at the portals of his tomb. But I rise, in accordance with the wishes of the delegation from South Carolina, to speak to the resolutions before us, with a sadness intensified by the warmth of personal attachment which I felt for the venerable deceased, whom I was proud in being able to call by the cherished title of friend.

Rarely, sir, have I known one so full of all those kindly attributes which win the affectionate regard of his associates, and bind them to him with almost the love of woman. Rarely has it been my good fortune to enjoy the confidence of one whose friendship was so full of heart; whose heart was so free from guile; whose mind was so devoid of bitterness and prejudice; whose bearing was so manly, and yet so gentle; and who, in the very fullness of years, retained the cheerful tone and the genial spirits of youth.

In the months that I sat at the same table with the venerable Senator who has departed from our midst, and in the many pleasant evenings in which, after the conflicts of the day were over, we enjoyed such friendly converse, seeking rather those things on which we agreed than those on which we were born to differ, I learned to know and to value him. He seemed to me like one of the patriarchs, cast in the olden mold; like one who, in the days of the Revolution, would have been ranked a worthy associate for those noble, yet unassuming men, who exhibited their heroism without boasting, and were willing to give their lives for their country without a sigh. Firm in his opinions, yet courteous in their expression; laborious in the arduous and thankless committee labor devolved upon him, and yet claiming no credit for its fulfillment; vigilantly watchful, and ever at his post in the Senate, claiming no exemption for years or feeble health, and invariably kind and affable to all who were brought in contact with him, I do not wonder that, in that grave and dignified body in the opposite wing of this Capitol, he was a universal favorite, cherished and beloved by all his compeers, from the shores of the Atlantic to the golden gate of the Pacific. Nor is it surprising that his native State, after he had worn her ermine so spotlessly and so well for a score of years, conferred upon him that crowning mark of her approval and confidence which placed him in the national Senate. It had been worthily earned, and its honors were worthily won.

But at last, after he had passed the allotted three-score years and ten, the messenger of death summoned him from this transitory life of toil below to that endless life of rest above. How kindly and tenderly that summons came, you all do know.

Not with the sharp anguish of fatal accident, crushing out life in pain and agony; not with the long days and weary nights of burning fever; not with that dread struggle in which the soul so often tears itself away from its mortal tenement; but calmly and peacefully, as if a fitting end of a life so gentle and serene, he closed his eyes upon "the last of earth," to open them in that home which for so many years he had been preparing himself to occupy.

And, while we mourn that the silver cord has been loosened, and the golden bowl broken, we can indeed and most truthfully exclaim:

"As a cloud of the sunset, slow melting in heaven,
As a star that is lost when the daylight is given,
As a glad dream of slumber which wakens in bliss,
He hath passed to the world of the holy from this.
But, oh! if one glance the freed spirit can throw
On this scene of its troubled vocation below—
Than the pride of the marble—the pomp of the dead—
To that glance will be dearer the tears which we shed."

The resolutions were unanimously adopted. Business was then suspended until two o'clock; when the House proceeded to the Senate Chamber, in compliance with the resolutions which had been adopted. Subsequently the House reassembled; and, on motion, adjourned until Monday.

Mr. SLIDELL objecting to the consideration of the resolution, it lies over under the rules.

SAN FRANCISCO POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRODERICK submitted the following preamble and resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Whereas, there has been charged to the Government up to quite recently, the sum of $18,000 per annum for the rent of the building occupied as a post office at San Francisco; and whereas, large sums of money have been realized from the rent of the lobby of said post office, which sums, it is generally reported, amounted to some seven thousand dollars per annum; and whereas, postmasters are required by law to make return, under oath, of all sums by them collected; and are prohibited from retaining, in the aggregate, more than $4.00 per year, "including salary, commissions, boxes, and all other fees, perquisites, and emoluments of any name or character whatsoever;"

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to inform the Senate whether any sums, and if so, what sums have been returned by the postmaster of San Francisco, as rents received for the use of the post office lobby, from July 1st, 1854, to December 31, 1857.

And whereas, there was placed on the files of the Post Office Department, in April, 1857, specific charges, duly sworn to, of malfeasance in office, of neglect of official duty, and of violations not only of the laws, but also of the regulations of the Post Office Department, on the part of the postmaster at San Francisco—which said charges are substantiated by the sworn testimony of some thirty or forty witnesses—a copy of the leading features of which testimony was also placed on file at the same time; and whereas, in February last, &c., or evidence, duly sworn to—charging the San Francisco postmaster with other acts of malfeasance in office—was placed upon the files of the Post Office Department; and whereas, the law, which is mandatory, says: "The Postmaster General shall prosecute offenses against the Post Office establishment;" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement showing the nature of the charges preferred against the postmaster of San Francisco, and the specific sections of the law which it is alleged he has violated, and showing also what action, if any, has been taken in regard to said charges; and in case no action has been taken, that the Postmaster General inform the Senate why the law has not been complied with, and why prosecution has not been made.

Mr. BROWN objecting to the consideration of the resolution, it lies over under the rules.

MILITARY REPORTS.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg leave to offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate the reports of the officers sent to Europe in 1855, to collect information in relation to military affairs, so far as they have not been heretofore communicated to the Senate; and that he also communicate his views as to the necessity of publishing said reports for the use of the Army and militia, and if the publication be desirable, the number of copies that would be required for the above purposes.

It will be recollected that three officers were sent to Europe to inquire into the state of military affairs, that one of those officers reported, and his report was communicated to and printed by order of the Senate. The other two officers had not completed their reports at the time. They have since, I believe, completed them, and the manuscripts are now in the War Department. The object of this resolution is to call for these reports in order that they may be printed. I think they will be of great use to the Army and to the militia. I, however, have chosen to ask that question of the Secretary of War, in order that these publications might not stand on the footing of the much decried books printed for circulation.

The report which was published—the report of Captain McClelland—was published by order of the Senate. There was rather a large edition; but a small number of copies only was given to the War Office. It has been circulated under the franks of Senators; it has gone over the country; but the Army and the militia have not been well supplied. The work is so valuable, however, that it is now on private sale in the city. The purpose of this resolution is only to reach the other two reports, which are on different branches of military affairs, and which, I think, will be found of great interest and of great value. If there be no objection, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would ask the Senator, if he pleases, what other reports there are which have not been recommended. We have already published the report of Captain McClelland, and I am not certain that we have not been publishing the reports of other officers.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator is very much mistaken if he supposes we have published the report of any other officer who went out at that time. That we have published many reports, I do not doubt. Three officers went to Europe. One of them, Captain McClelland, made his report, which was printed by order of the Senate. The report of the senior officer, Major Delafield, and the report of the second officer, Major Mordecai, have not yet been received by the Senate. The board was composed of an officer of engineers, an officer of ordnance, and an officer of cavalry. The report of the cavalry officer has been published; the other two reports have not been. I think they are of great value. The men were selected with much care, and admirably qualified for the performance of the duty.

I have departed from the usual form of a resolution calling for papers, by asking the Secretary of War to communicate his opinion in relation to the papers. If that had been done in the beginning, this vast publication of every species of paper that might be drawn out by any drag-net any member chose to throw out, would have been suppressed long ago. I have also asked him to state how many copies will be required for the use of the Army and militia; because it is for that purpose I want the book published—not to be circulated under the franks of members of Congress merely, for their own benefit, and thrown in the hands of persons who may never read them, and who certainly will have no use for them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Under the rules of the Senate, whenever the answer is made, the subject will be considered by the Committee on Printing, and I think it is nothing more than proper that the resolution of the gentleman should be allowed to pass that we may have the information from the War Department. When we get it we shall have power to look into it and see what ought to be done with it. I would, however, suggest that the Senator amend his resolution so that the Secretary of War shall furnish to us no incomplete report from any of these officers. If he can state, as I presume he can, that the reports he now calls for are complete, it will do away with considerable objection to the resolution itself.

Mr. DAVIS. The reports are complete, so far as the War Department is concerned. The report of Captain McClelland was complete when it came in. I was a little surprised at the answer the Senator from Arkansas made to an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] the other day, that he believed nothing was ever finished. The report of Captain McClelland was complete when it came in. It has been printed, and gone to the public. There is nothing more on that subject to come.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am sorry to reiterate to the Senator now that I see this matter is not complete by far, because he calls for more than we have received on the same subject.

Mr. DAVIS. The reports of the other officers who went to Europe are called for. The report of Captain McClelland, as I stated, was complete as it was sent in, and printed as sent in. The reports of these officers are complete; but without the Senate, by any order to print in quarto form, or by any order to collect other information, will add to the work after it comes in, is more than I know. If they will leave the reports of the officers to stand as submitted, I say they are complete. That is the only answer I can give.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The War Department, I trust, will furnish no incomplete reports to us on the subject, and I shall make no opposition to the resolution.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INTER-OCEANIC COMMUNICATION.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish to the Senate the result of the recent exploration under the command of Lieutenant T. A. Craven, of the United States Navy, as to the practicability of inter-oceanic communication from the Gulf of Darien to the Pacific ocean, by the Atrato and Truando rivers.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I want to say to my friend that we have provided, by an appropriation of $20,000, for the examination of this route; and this resolution is merely calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to send us in the results of the survey, as the officer who made it has just arrived. It is not for printing, or anything of that kind; but the session is drawing to a close, and we should have it at once.

Mr. PUGH. Let it lie over. It may lead us into this book business.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, was received, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the bill was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LOCATION OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. STUART. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up a bill of public importance and pass it at this time. It is the bill (S. No. 47) confirming locations of land warrants under certain circumstances. It is one which will create no debate. I move to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The original bill provided for the confirmation of locations heretofore made with bounty land warrants on lands which were subject to entry at private sale, but which upon individual competition were put up to the highest bidder, and the excess paid for in cash if they were in all other respects regular.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in all cases in which locations have been made with bounty land warrants on lands which were subject to entry at private sale, but upon individual competition were put up to the highest bidder, and the excess paid for in cash, such locations shall be, and they are hereby, confirmed, if in all other respects regular, and authority is hereby given to issue patents accordingly: Provided, That such confirmation shall only extend to cases existing prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a little resolution on the table, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment. I ask that it be taken up and disposed of.

The Senate proceeded to consider the House amendment to the joint resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" which was to strike out "16th day of April, 1858," and insert "16th day of April, 1859."

Mr. HALE. I hope we shall concur in that amendment at once. It is merely to correct a clerical error.

The amendment was concurred in.

JEREMIAH MOORS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill (S. No. 222) for the relief of Jeremiah Moors. I presume it will not consume any time.

Mr. IVERSON. I will move an amendment to that motion, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar until one o'clock. The Private Calendar was to have been taken up last Friday; but, owing to the melancholy circumstance of the death of one of our colleagues, we lost that day. If the Senate will take up the Private Calendar from now to one o'clock, we shall probably make up for the loss of time to which it has been subjected. I must object to taking up private bills out of their order, to-day. It is rather unfair to other private claimants to do so. I think the best way is to proceed in order, and take up the Private Calendar regularly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is before the Senate, that the Senate take up this bill.

Mr. IVERSON. If the bill will not give rise to discussion, I do not wish to interpose objection; but, after that, I shall insist on proceeding with the Private Calendar regularly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it will not lead to discussion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 222) for the relief of Jeremiah Moors.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jeremiah Moors a just compensation for labor bestowed, and for mortar and other materials used (except the rough stone for the tower) in building a light-house, in the year 1831, on the outer Thunder Bay Island of Lake Huron, which was built under a contract made between Adam D. Stuart, the agent of the United States, and Henry T. Blake, dated August 30, 1831, and assigned by Blake, with the consent of Mr. Stuart, to Jeremiah Moors, by whom it was built.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should like to hear something about that bill. The claim seems to be about a quarter of a century old, and appears to me to be a very strange one, from the statement of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. HAMLIN, on the 29th of April:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Jeremiah Moors, with a bill accompanying the same, having examined the same, report:

That they adopt the report of the committee made January 25, 1855, in the following words:

"That on August 30, 1831, Henry T. Blake contracted with Adam D. Stuart, an agent of the United States, to build a light-house on the outer Thunder Bay Island, in Lake Huron; that on the same day that this contract bears date, Mr. Blake assigned it to the memorialist, constituting him his agent to perform the contract, and to receive the pay of the Government therefor, and he was accepted by the Government agent to do the work, as the substitute of Mr. Blake, the original contractor; that he proceeded with the Government agent to the place of location and commenced the work, upon the site selected by said Government agent, prosecuted the same with skill and energy, in strict conformity to the contract, and to the entire satisfaction of the superintendent, until it was nearly completed—only a small amount of labor to be performed upon the lantern—when a gale of unusual violence arose, and a tremendous seaswept over several acres of that part of the island on which the light-house was located, beating against it with great force, and after withstanding the gale for some time it gave way and fell into the lake, leaving about twenty feet on the land side standing, a perfectly sound wall.

"From all the evidence presented to the committee in this case, they are of opinion that the destruction of the tower was wholly attributable to the injudicious and exposed location of the building, and to the severity of the storms, (for which the memorialist was not responsible), and not to any defect in the materials or workmanship of the building; and it was no fault of the contractor that it was not entirely finished, for he was directed to place it where it could not stand, and where he was not able to finish the lantern before the tower fell.

"It is evident that the site was selected in good faith by the Government agent, he being entirely ignorant of the great rise of water during the furious storms that beat upon it. It is evident that the site was an unwise and injudicious one, from the fact that the Government selected a site for the new light-house further from the water and upon higher ground. The second light-house was built by the memorialist, and out of the same materials, and stands firm to the present time.

"The memorialist did not undertake to guaranty the suitability of the site, but to furnish the labor and materials for the structure, and for its failure the Government is alone responsible, and the committee know of no rule of law or justice which would allow the Government to shelter itself from the payment of a just compensation for its labor performed, because its agent had selected an unsuitable site for the building."

In view of the facts presented, the committee have come to the conclusion that the memorialist is entitled to compensation for the mortar used and labor performed in building the first light-house, and recommend the passage of the bill submitted to the committee.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to refer this bill to the Court of Claims. This is a most extraordinary report. There are a great many allegations of fact in it which the committee state to be evident, that they could not by possibility know by any fair evidence, unless they took great pains to attain it, and went out there. In the first place, they say the site was selected by the Government; and, in the second, that it was an injudicious selection, and that the materials and workmanship were all right. This comes to us after a lapse of twenty-six years. If all those allegations be true, the claimant has a legal claim on the Government. They do not offer the slightest reason in their report why the man has waited a quarter of a century to get pay for a light-house washed away in 1831. I suppose, like a great many claims, in the obscurity of time the facts have been lost. No such claim ought ever to be paid, unless there is good and substantial reason given why it should be allowed, and why it has not been pressed before. I move that it be sent to the Court of Claims, in order that the facts may come before us after having been judicially ascertained.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I can answer very substantially every objection the Senator from Georgia has made. First, as to the time which has elapsed since the claim originated—I cannot recollect how long, but for some fifteen or twenty years, the claimant has been pressing it here in Congress, and bills have passed each House allowing it, but never each House at the same session. As to the way in which the committee got at the evidence, it was by the affidavits of shipmasters who reside in the vicinity, taken under oath, and filed in the case.

Mr. TOOMBS. Ex parte.

Mr. HAMLIN. Somewhat ex parte, but there was also the statement of the Government agent himself. All concurred that the site was in the wrong place. That is also proved by the very fact that before the work was completed and hardened the tempests beat it down, and then they immediately transferred it to a higher point, where the waves and waters did not break on it. I think it a very equitable and very just claim. None more so has ever passed this body.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator does not answer the objection, for according to his own statement, if his recollection serves him right, it has been here only ten or fifteen years. Taking the shortest time he names, sixteen years elapsed before the presentation of the claim, and taking the longest time, eleven years elapsed. Then, may we not well ask, where was the party from 1831 to 1842? According to the loose statement the Senator makes, he says he is not accurate about it, there were between ten and twenty years after the falling of the light-house, before the claim was presented. He also admits, that whatever facts the committee had were got by ex parte affidavits, furnished by the claimants. Why shall not these facts be ascertained judicially? If the facts be true, it is a legal claim; there is not a shadow of doubt about it; because, if he did his work right, and the place was selected by the Government, he has the right of action against the Government, and could recover it in any court of law against any individual, and, therefore, could against the Government, in the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state the reason why this claim has not been acted upon. Mr. Moors, I have known personally for many years. He was a very worthy, industrious, good mechanic. His loss upon this light-house alone impoverished him. He was not able to come here and prosecute his claim. He intrusted it to General Cass, my predecessor, and to different members of the other House. As the Senator from Maine says, it has been seesawing between the two Houses, I cannot tell how many times. This identical bill has passed the Senate two or three times, and as many times has passed through the other House. To send this claim to the Court of Claims is equivalent to saying to the man, you shall have no justice from this Government, for he is not able to prosecute the claim. He was impoverished by this very misfortune. I hope that this honest, just, proven claim will be no longer deferred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to refer this case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want simply to say that on looking at the papers I find that so early as 1832, the claimant commenced the prosecution of this claim. The work was done in 1831.

Mr. STUART. This claim has been before Congress ever since I have been a member of it, and has passed one House or the other several times. The committee that now reports it is a committee of which the honorable Senator from Georgia is a member—the Committee on Commerce. If he has any doubt about this claim, and wishes to examine it himself as a member of the committee, I have no objection to giving him an opportunity to do so. I am certain that this memorialist has pressed his claim from the time he had an opportunity to do so down to to-day, with as much vigilance as any man could. I have examined it myself twice, once whilst I was a member of the Committee on Commerce; and I think if the Senator from Georgia will examine the papers in the case, he will be satisfied that there is no fault on the part of the memorialist. I hope that the paper alluded to by the Senator from Maine will be presented to the Senate, so that it will be seen that this is not an old claim hatched up now.

Mr. TOOMBS. The facts stated by gentlemen around me, the advocates of the bill, furnish the most conclusive evidence of the necessity of the action which I propose. The Senator who reported the bill from the Committee on Commerce says the case has been here for ten or fifteen years. I am a member of that committee, but I never heard of it there; probably this was owing to my own neglect, but that is the fact. He now turns to some paper and says it was presented the year after the work was done. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who is the earnest advocate of this bill, says the reason why the claimant did not come here was that he was too poor. It seems by the other statement that he did come.

Mr. CHANDLER. Too poor to be here in person.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not know that that is necessary. I do not presume that there is a single man of any State, who has a just claim, whose Senators or Representatives will not present it to Congress, and attend to it for him. It is the business of every one who represents the people to do so; and I have no doubt it is the pleasure of every gentleman to do so. I would not only present them from my own State, but from any State. If any man sent his claim here with the evidence, I should deem it my duty to give him that just attention to which he was entitled, no matter what part of the Republic he might come from; and I am sure this is the rule of all the members of the Senate and House of Representatives. No matter in what portion of the Republic, or in what other country petitioners may live, it is our duty to present their claims, and I am sure it is done by all of us here.

The claim being a legal claim, and according to the papers a just claim, if the facts be as alleged, it could be judicially determined. The cost of doing so is very small. The amount of the claim is large. Any one who has a just claim for $1,800 could have the best counsel in the country to attend to it. We have determined, on account of these very difficulties, to refer the cases that stand on this basis to the Court of Claims. Why bring in a portion from Committees on Claims, or Committees on Commerce, or Committees on Military Affairs? I believe that nine tenths of the cases which the Senate is continually pressed to consider, to the omission of the general public business, come legitimately and expressly within the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; and oftentimes they are fraudulent, and brought here because a committee is necessarily an easier place than a court. Refer it to my committee, and I must necessarily take ex parte evidence. I am not in a condition to look out and get evidence on the other side. That is the very reason we established the court—mainly to get the facts on both sides.

I have heard gentlemen frequently complain that the objects of this court were defeated. One class desire that we should make its judgment always conclusive, or they say it is no court. The object of the court is explicit. It answers it wisely and well. The Senate and House of Representatives can overturn its judgment; and then it is no judgment. Does that make it any the less a court? If that is the case, there is no court in England; for one branch of Parliament can overturn the Queen's Bench. In the State of New York, for many years, one branch of the Legislature could overturn the judicial opinions of all her courts. Probably it is so now. I know it was some years ago, when I was more intimately acquainted with the practice. This is a court whose judgment may be reversed by the legislative department. That is all it ought to be, and ever can be. This case should go there as not only a case expressly within their jurisdiction; but for the purpose of enabling Congress to act with certainty on all the facts, we have a right, as a distinct head of jurisdiction, to refer to the Court of Claims when we are doubtful as to the facts. Every Senator knows it is impossible to get at them by committees in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred; particularly when matters happen in pais, at places remote from the seat of Government, twenty-five years back. It is very remarkable that this man should have been here twenty-five years ago, and never got his claim through. Very probably at that time other people knew something about it. The Secretary of the Treasury knew all about it. The officers of the Government knew something about it. They have passed away in this quarter of a century. Where are they to-day? The claimant comes here to-day with this ex parte statement, and asks the Senate to pass it. It is bad as a principle; it is bad as a precedent; and the Senate ought not to allow it.

Mr. STUART. I am not disposed to discuss the principles of action of the Court of Claims, or the propriety of their decisions; for I do not think it is at all involved in this case. This is a case which has from time to time received the favorable action of Congress; and I think I can state, in a few words, why, without the action of Congress, this man cannot get his pay.

This man entered into a contract to complete a light-house, and until he has completed it he has no legal right of action. If he had completed the light-house, he could have gone to the Treasury Department, shown his evidence, and taken his pay; but not having completed the light-house, he cannot thus get his pay. I agree that if this were a case between individuals, it would be equivalent to a performance on the part of the contractor, to show that the performance was prevented by the bad selection of the other's agents, and by the elements. It would give him a right to recover, under a quantum meruit, not the contract price, but a fair compensation for what he had done; but he has no such right here. If he goes to the Court of Claims, and that court holds that they will decide only what is the law of the case, it will be reported back here a failure; they could not decide in his favor. It presents itself now to the equity of Congress, as it would present itself to a jury, if it were a case between individuals—not that the man has performed his contract—it is not pretended; but that he has done everything in his power to perform it; that he has been prevented by the elements, and in consequence of an injudicious selection by the officer of the Government. The papers state that the experience of the Government, ascertained in consequence of this injudicious selection, induced them, when they rebuilt the light-house, to go further back on a higher ground, which was permanent, and was secure against the action of the lakes.

The case is indisputable, and it is undisputed. I humbly submit to the Senate and to the consideration of my honorable friend from Georgia that, if the facts he supposes be true, and I cannot say whether they are or are not, they constitute a reason why the Senate should not send the case to the Court of Claims. If it be true that witnesses are dead; that this man, having done this work in 1831, applied for compensation in 1832, and that in the mean time the witnesses are dead, so that he cannot now make his full proof in a court upon a new case, as he has been able to make in this case, it presents a conclusive reason why it should not be sent to the court. This man is an entire stranger to me. True, he is a constituent of mine; but personally I have no knowledge of him, though I have had a personal knowledge of the case for years; and, as stated by my colleague, I remember that General Cass, my late distinguished colleague, being more immediately in the vicinity of this claimant, took a great interest in the case, examined it, had it presented to the committee, and, when the bill was before the Senate, had it passed so far as his personal efforts could go. He was conversant with the witnesses and the facts, and so stated here. But we all know that, when a case goes to the House of Representatives, it is a mere question of time. If you have time, you can pass the bill; but if the case is not reached until the heel of the session, it is gone; a single objection stops its passage unless you can get a two-third vote. Thus this claimant stands to-day. The papers are clear. The report of two committees of the Senate have been made on it, which have been read—the report of the Senate committee of 1855, indorsed by the committee of the present session; and of which committee, as I stated, the honorable Senator from Georgia is a member. I hope he did not understand me as charging him with being negligent of his duties, because I did not mean to allege any such thing. I certainly disavow anything of that sort. I only stated that he was a member of the committee, and that, if as a member of the committee he wished an examination of the case himself, I should not object to it; I should think it due to him, and should agree to it, because I am satisfied, that the more this case is examined, the more it will address itself to the equitable and just consideration of the Senate.

This is one of those clear cases which are indisputable. The man cannot get his money at the Treasury, because there he must show a compliance with the contract. My impression is—I do not like to speak with much confidence, though I find the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] agrees with me—that, if we send him to the Court of Claims, he will be obliged there to show a compliance with his contract. But, however that may be, it is a case which began here long before the Court of Claims began. It is a case which, upon the facts, has never been disputed; there have been no adverse reports; it has been favorably considered; and I do trust this man, if he be poor, as my colleague says, will not be sent to the Court of Claims, where it will cost him half or two thirds of the whole claim to get his case tried.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator from Michigan who was last up mentioned my name, and that is my excuse for saying a word. It seems to me that, whether this man succeeds in the Court of Claims or not will depend on certain facts which do not yet appear. If the place of location for the building of this light-house was fixed upon to begin with, and the man made his contract to build a light-house in that place, and after he put up his tower a violent storm demolished it, and the circumstances were such that the officers of the Government, as well as the contractor, became satisfied that one could not be made to stand in that place at all, and they went on higher ground, to a safer place, to build the house with the materials they took from this one—under such a state of circumstances, it would seem to me that the man would not have a legal claim. If he undertook to build and finish a light-house in a particular place, he knowing the place, the chances of exposure to storm would be all at his own risk. It would be the risk of the Government whether it would stand there after he had got it done; but it would be his own risk whether he could complete it. The interpositions of the orderings of Providence would be matters of his own risk while he was building it, and the risk of the Government after he finished.

Such, I think, would be the legal effect; but if the Government made an agreement with him, a contract to build a light-house on a particular island, and they selected the place for him to build it on, he not knowing the particular place at the time of the contract, and they selected such a place that it could not be built there, or could not stand there after it was built when a storm came on—in that case the man would have a legal claim for a quantum meruit for the amount which he laid out, which was lost by the injudicious selection of the Government. How that was in point of fact in this instance, I do not know.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is stated in the report that the Government made a contract and selected the place.

Mr. STUART. That is always done. Congress makes an appropriation to build a light-house at a particular place. A contract is entered into to build a light-house at that place. Then the United States officer goes and selects the spot, after the contract is made, on which to put it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have stated my distinction in that respect. If the selection was made after the contract was entered into and made by the Government, I agree in that case with the Senator from Georgia; but if it was the other way, if he contracted to build it on a spot which was selected at the time of the contract, that being part of the contract, he would have no legal claim.

Mr. TOOMBS. It was exactly that state of facts stated in the report on which I based my opinion. The report states that he made a contract and then the Government agent went and selected the place.

Mr. COLLAMER. If that was the order of events, I agree in opinion with the honorable Senator from Georgia, that it is a good legal claim.

Mr. PUGH. I concur in the views expressed by the Senator from Vermont, as to the law of the case, and I dissent from the law as expressed in the report. It seems to me the strangest proposition that the Government of the United States is the insurer of a house in the hands of a contractor up to the time it is finished. It is his house until we accept it; and if this is the act of God, without any fault of either party, it is his loss and not ours. If it were brought forward as a claim on our generosity, I might listen to it, but the report states it as a legal claim. But even if it be an equitable claim, as the Senator from Michigan thinks, the Court of Claims has jurisdiction. As the Senator from Georgia has truly said, it is a separate head of jurisdiction in that court to examine any claim referred to it by either House of Congress. It makes no difference whether it is a legal claim or equitable claim; it is a complete head of jurisdiction in the court itself, and it can investigate the case much better than we can. For these reasons I shall vote for the reference.

Mr. HAMLIN. These papers were originally submitted to Mr. Louis McLane, while he was Secretary of the Treasury; and after an examination of the matter they were transmitted to the House of Representatives by the Delegate from Michigan Territory at that time; and here is what the Secretary said then:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 27, 1832.

SIR: I have the honor to return the papers transmitted by you to this Department on the subject of the light-houses at Chicago, and outer Thunder Bay Island, in the Territory of Michigan. The contract not having been fulfilled, the relief sought for by the contractors can only be obtained through the interposition of Congress. The reports of the Fifth Auditor, and of the collector at Michilimackinac are also inclosed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LOUIS McLANE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. A. E. WING, House of Representatives.

The Secretary himself reports the reason why it was not allowed at the Treasury Department, that he had no legal authority to allow it, because it was a contract not completed. That was the view I took of it. The Senator from Ohio says that a case not based on law may be referred to the Court of Claims, and they may act upon it. Now, I understand that papers have been referred to the court by Congress, I think at this session, not based upon law, but upon equity, and they have decided that they had no authority over them, unless they were based on some preëxisting contract. I understand that the court have decided directly opposite to what the Senator from Ohio says. I do not say that it is so; I have been so told; I have not looked at the report. If that be so, and this be nothing but an equitable claim, based upon equity, then the court would not adjudicate upon it if we were to refer it to them. I think it an equitable claim.

The question being put on the motion to refer the case to the Court of Claims there was no quorum voting.

Mr. CLAY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. I am in favor of the motion made by my colleague, to refer this case to the Court of Claims; and the very fact that it is a disputed question here upon this floor, whether this is a legal or an equitable claim, is a conclusive reason why it ought to go to the Court of Claims; because we cannot decide here whether it is a legal or an equitable claim. If the facts be as put by the Senator from Michigan, it seems to me that there is no doubt that the party has a legal claim, and can have it adjudicated in the Court of Claims, and obviate all difficulty in its passage. If the Government agreed to give him so much money for building the light-house, and selected the spot, and afterwards they moved the place for the erection of the light-house, as a matter of course he is entitled to damages for a violation of the contract on the part of the Government; but whether it be a legal or equitable claim, it ought to go to the Court of Claims, there to be investigated on the facts.

The Senate and House of Representatives, in deciding these claims, have to decide upon ex parte evidence; and one principle object of the erection of the Court of Claims was to protect the Government from an ex parte examination. One of the principal objects of the Court of Claims was, that all cases might undergo a judicial investigation, and that the testimony might be so marshaled that the Government would be protected from fraud and imposition. Here we have to decide upon the ex parte testimony taken, as in this case. We may be imposed upon by fraudulent evidence, by forgery, by false testimony. There are various ways in which a party may bring forward testimony here, colored or forged or fraudulent, by which he may impose on Congress; but that is not so when he goes before the Court of Claims. There witnesses are examined by commissioners appointed by the court; the attorney of the party and the attorney of the Government are both present at the examination of witnesses, and there is a fair and impartial mode of bringing the case properly before the court.

It is true the Court of Claims does not decide on equity cases, although they may be referred by either House of Congress. I think, in this respect, the Court of Claims has committed an error in refusing to decide on equity cases which have been submitted to it by a resolution of either House. They have decided that, in order to give them jurisdiction, the case must arise upon an act of Congress, or upon a treaty, or upon a contract, express or implied, or upon some regulation of an Executive Department. These are the various heads under which jurisdiction is given to the Court of Claims by the act erecting that court; and they have refused to give any opinion on any case which depends on mere equitable considerations. I think they are wrong; but still that is the practice of the court. But how can we decide here whether this is one of those cases or not? The facts are all ex parte. Some gentlemen say this is a legal claim; some say it is an equitable claim. To ascertain the facts in a conclusive manner, it ought to go to the Court of Claims, where the evidence can be marshaled according to law.

Mr. CHANDLER. Whether this claim be a legal one or not, I cannot say, not being a lawyer; but that it is an equitable claim I can state positively. If any Senator will read the documents in the hands of the committee that reported the bill, he will be satisfied that it is equitable, whatever its legality may be. This claimant is not able to prosecute the claim before the Court of Claims; and such a course would swallow up half of the amount involved, at least, in its prosecution, and even then it must come back to this House whether it be legal or equitable; and the same trouble must again be undertaken by him to get his just equitable rights. I hope the bill may be killed at once rather than send it to the Court of Claims. It is death to him in either event.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, and Toombs—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brederick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—27.

So the Senate refused to refer the bill to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the bill in the fourth line, by inserting after the words "Jeremiah Moors" the words "or his legal representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (No. 286) to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land districts, in Michigan;

A bill (No. 296) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to establish two additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota," approved July 8, 1856;

A resolution (No. 30) to extend for a further term the provisions of the joint resolution, approved March 10, 1858, in relation to certain dropped and retired officers of the Navy;

A resolution (No. 33) authorizing suitable acknowledgments to be made by the President to the British naval authorities at Jamaica for the relief extended to the officers and crew of the United States ship Susquehanna, disabled by yellow fever;

A bill (No. 300) for the relief of the Hungarian settlers upon certain tracts of land in Iowa, hitherto reserved from sale by order of the President, dated January 22, 1855;

A bill (No. 307) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old custom-house and site in Bath, Maine, and for other purposes; and

A bill (No. 313) to amend the act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," passed March 3, 1851.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Also, that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 300) declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One o'clock has been the usual hour for calling up the special orders. Formerly, when the Senate met regularly at eleven o'clock, twelve o'clock was the hour. The Chair does not know what is the sense of the Senate on this point, whether the special orders shall be called up at one or at twelve o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. It is understood that an hour is devoted to the morning business.

Mr. STUART. Perhaps it would be better to let the special orders remain at the usual hour, because, at any time, by a vote of the Senate, they can be taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The practice of the Senate heretofore has been, when the hour of meeting has been changed from twelve to eleven o'clock, to regard the time gained as an addition to the morning hour, and not as changing the hour for the special orders; and therefore I take it for granted that we shall go on with other business until one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not the purpose of the Chair to call up the special orders, but simply to bring the subject to the attention of the Senate. If no motion be made, the Chair will regard it as the sense of the Senate that he is not to call up the special orders until one o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the special order be now taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator as got ahead of me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Alabama desires it, the Chair will take the sense of the Senate as to whether one o'clock shall remain as the hour for the special orders.

Mr. CLAY. Perhaps it had better be settled at once, in order that the Chair may regulate its course hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I think it would be proper to let the practice remain as it has been. As I have already said, the practice hitherto has been to regard the additional time as an addition to the morning hour, during which much of what is peculiarly morning business, and a great deal of other business of the Senate, can be disposed of. A great deal of good has been the result of this practice heretofore. I do not think it will promote the public business to make the change which has been suggested; that is, that the special orders shall be advanced to twelve o'clock. I trust that the practice of the Senate hitherto will be allowed to prevail, at least for a week or more.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate can very promptly dispose of the question, and the Chair will take the sense of the Senate in this form: Shall the hour of one o'clock continue to be the hour at which the special orders shall be called up? Senators in favor of that will say "ay."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I repeat, that formerly when the Senate met at eleven o'clock, twelve was not the hour, under the practice of the Senate, at which the special orders were called up; it continued to be one o'clock. I have consulted the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] on the subject, and he informs me that the practice has been as I have stated; and he is very conversant with the practice of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair referred to the period of time fixed in Mr. Jefferson's Manual, when the time of meeting, originally, was eleven o'clock: he does not know what has been the practice of the Senate in more recent years. The Senate, however, can determine the question.

Mr. MASON. I think the practice of the Senate has been, for the dispatch of public business, to make such subjects as it thought proper special orders; and in designating the hour for the special order it has been fixed, still with reference to the dispatch of public business, at one hour after the meeting of the Senate, in order that the first hour may be given to what is called the morning business, consisting of petitions, reports from committees, and resolutions. The usage of the Senate, I think, has been to consider that one hour is enough for that miscellaneous business which is more introductory than otherwise to the general business of the Senate, and it has been understood that only one hour should be devoted to it. If I am correct in that, it would result that twelve o'clock would now be the proper time for the special orders. I should think there is an additional reason: if we are to adjourn at the time indicated by the joint resolution of the two Houses, which has been agreed to, it is more important that we should dispatch the business before the Senate than originate new business.

Mr. HUNTER. What is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will restate the question. Originally the hour of meeting of the Senate was eleven o'clock at the beginning of the Government, and twelve o'clock was then the hour for calling for the special orders. The hour of one o'clock is the hour under the meeting at twelve o'clock. Recently the Senate has changed the hour of meeting to eleven o'clock. The Chair desires to know the pleasure of the Senate as to the time at which he shall call up the special orders—twelve o'clock, or one o'clock?

Mr. HUNTER. Those in favor of calling up the special order at twelve o'clock will say "ay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question in this form: Is it the sense of the Senate that one o'clock shall continue to be the hour for calling the special orders? If the majority vote in the negative, the Chair will consider it a direction to call them at twelve o'clock.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall call them at twelve.

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 16, noes 20.

So the Senate decided that the special orders should be called at twelve o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. I hope, then, that the special order will be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will take up the special order at this time.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the decision?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The decision is, that twelve o'clock shall be the hour for calling up the special orders.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote was decisive, and the result was announced by the Chair. The first special order is the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding.

Mr. CLAY. I move to postpone the further consideration of that resolution until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws, or parts of laws, allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries.

Mr. CLAY. If the debate is closed on the other side of this question, I will submit a few remarks in reply to what fell from the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLEN] the other day. But as I am entitled, according to parliamentary law, to close the debate, I do not wish to precede gentlemen who have anything to say in opposition to this bill. I will remark here, however, that I trust the debate will be concluded to-day. I do not now propose to occupy the time of the Senate more than twenty minutes, and I shall probably not consume more time after having heard what may be further said. I trust we may have the vote to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I had some idea of submitting a few remarks on this subject, but I understood that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] desired to speak this morning, and I do not see him in his seat. It is a matter of indifference to me whether I go on now or not. I may, perhaps, as well say what I have to say now as at any other time.

Mr. President, I am disposed to say a few words; not with the idea that I can add anything to what has been said by my colleague, but simply because this is a matter of so much interest to a portion of the people of my State that it may be that they would expect that I should at least manifest that I am taking an interest in the question, and observing the progress of it. I propose to do that by expressing my concurrence in the positions that have been taken by my colleague, and by adding a few words on points which have not been so much elaborated by him.

The first position taken by the honorable Senator from Alabama, in relation to this question, was, that this bounty, as it is called, upon the catching of cod fish, whether it is a "momentous concern" or otherwise, originated entirely in the imposition of a duty on salt, and the fact that it was thought reasonable that the amount of that duty, or nearly the amount of that duty, should be refunded on all the fish that were exported. It was assumed by the Senator from Alabama that that policy, thus originated and thus founded, has continued to be the policy of the Government on that foundation and with reference to that particular thing, down to the present time.

Now, Mr. President, I think that the Senator was very considerably in error, not only by not giving sufficient importance to one reason for which the policy originated, but also in assuming that that particular reason, which he states to be the foundation of the policy, has continued to be its foundation down to the present time. The facts in reference to the matter, and the laws which have been passed, when examined, will not support him in that assumption. It is true, that the early advocates of the policy did assume, in argument, and did press it strongly on the ground of justice, that it was due to the people who caught and salted cod fish, and exported them that the amount paid by them, as duty on salt, should be refunded. But the Senator will remember that, although this may have been the case when the first act was passed, when the salt duty and the drawback went pretty much hand in hand, though the amount of the drawback did not equal the amount of the duty, yet one reason given even at that time was the importance of promoting the fisheries, and promoting them with reference to the education of seamen. In 1792, that policy was distinctly adopted, and that argument was distinctly pressed. The Senator from Alabama has read, and everybody has, who has looked into the subject at all, the report made by Mr. Jefferson; and he will recollect that Mr. Jefferson lays great stress on the necessity of educating seamen, and he urges that as one reason why the fisheries should be protected in some manner. The peculiar notions which he entertained, and a large class of men with him, in reference to bounties, and which have come down to the present day, and in which I share in some degree, rendered it advisable to place it on a distinct ground—on ground which would be recognized by every one as within the Constitution, both in letter and spirit, and such as no one would make objection to. But still the Senator will perceive, as others must have perceived then, that, although it was placed in the shape of a drawback, yet the giving of that drawback was, of itself, a bounty. Drawbacks are not usually given to articles which have gone into manufacture, when the manufactured articles themselves are exported. A policy of that kind is found in very few cases, I do not know in what exact number, in the history of our Government. It is very well known that the price of any article which has been manufactured depends not only upon the original cost of catching, for instance, if you take the cod fish or beef, or anything else, but also upon the addition made to it by the salting or any other process. If that article is exported and sold in foreign countries, they get all that cost as well as the duty laid on the materials used in the manufacture; and, if a drawback is given on exportation, that amount of drawback is in fact so much bounty. It does not diminish the price, when the price itself can only be diminished by competition; the article will command the same price, and the drawback which is received in fact is received as bounty, and operates as bounty, and was so understood at that time, and it had all the effect of a bounty.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate will perceive that, when the policy was changed in 1792, and by acts which have been passed subsequently to that time, although the bounty kept pace, in a certain degree, with the duty on salt, yet being allowed on tonnage, as it was distinctly by that act, it did away entirely with the argument. Although it was used as a reason for giving it in that way, yet the bounty given on tonnage had no reference whatever to exportation. If you give a certain amount of allowance—for it went under the name of allowance—upon the tonnage of a vessel engaged in the cod fisheries, or any other fisheries, and no provision whatever is made with reference to exportation, as in that case, the allowance is paid, whether a single quintal of fish is exported or not. It has no reference to drawback. That was the case of the act of 1792.

The Senator has argued here that it was drawback from the beginning, and that it kept pace with the duty on salt. How could it? The original act provided for a return of the duties when the fish were exported. The act of 1792 did away with that, and, in the place of it, gave a specific allowance on the tonnage of the vessel. That amounted to about the same sum, says the Senator; and it is unnecessary for my argument to dispute that; but it made no provision whatever that the fish caught by that vessel should be exported. The amount was paid upon the tonnage of the vessel itself, and that whether the fish were exported or not. It had no reference to exportation.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator has not read the act as well as I have. I will teach him differently.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there anything of that kind in the act?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would thank the Senator to point my attention to it. There is nothing of that sort, certainly, in the act of 1813.

Mr. CLAY. I take issue with everything the Senator has said; but, to relieve him, I will call his attention to that. I will read a single section of the act. There are others which corroborate the position I assume; but the sixth section of the act of 1813 goes on to provide the amount of allowance to vessels of five and less than twenty tons, and makes this a condition of the allowance:

"Provided, however, That this allowance shall be made only to such boats or vessels as shall have been actually employed at sea in the cod fishery four months, at the least, of the preceding season: And provided also, That such boat or vessel shall have landed, in the course of said preceding season, a quantity of fish of not less than twelve quintals for every ton of her admeasurements; the said quantity of fish to be ascertained when dried and cured fit for exportation, and according to the weight thereof as the same shall weigh at the time of delivery when actually sold."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I noticed, Mr. President, and on the reading of that I repeat my assertion. Where will you get it? In what way will you get it? It is to be paid at the beginning or end of the year; and that only applies to small vessels; it does not apply to the larger vessels of twenty tons or upwards. The provision applies only to the small vessels, between five and twenty tons. That is the shore fishing; and it is to be paid on the shore fishing, not on the amount of fresh fish they bring in; but it is introduced in regard to the small vessels, in order to show by the amount of fish they catch that they have really been employed in fishing—in the business they assume to have been employed in. If the Senator will examine that act of 1813 again, and examine it carefully, he will find that it is precisely as I say. The act of 1792 changed the original provision from a drawback to an allowance made on account of the tonnage. It made no provision for exportation whatever, not the slightest; but so much was to be paid on a vessel of certain size per ton, provided that vessel was engaged four months in fishing during the fishing season, which was nine months in the year; and in 1813, when the act was renewed, it made certain other provisions, which the Senator has read.

With regard, as I stated before, to the larger vessels, those which were built for the bank fisheries particularly, the dangerous navigation, there is no provision whatever as to the amount they should catch in any shape or form; but they must simply be engaged for four months. They might catch more or less. With regard to the smaller vessels, between five and twenty tons, the provision that they should bring in a certain amount of fish was inserted in order to prove that they had been engaged in actual fishing, because they did not go off on a distant voyage; and in order to estimate that amount, it was to be taken, not as fresh fish, but when it had been properly cured for exportation; that is, as fish is cured for exportation; but there is no provision from the beginning to the end of it, providing for the exportation of a single pound in order to receive the bounty. Therefore the argument of the Senator as to the acts of 1792 and of 1813 fails, and fails thoroughly, for when Congress changed the provision from a drawback to an allowance upon tonnage, they gave it whether a single pound of fish was exported or not. Every particle of it might be used in this country; not a single iota was required to be exported; and yet the amount of bounty was given.

So, then, the argument of the Senator falls in the commencement, and it is not supported by the extracts which he read from the speeches of sundry gentlemen who spoke upon the occasion, who supposed there would be an actual saving by the change. Afterwards, when the duty on salt was by degrees reduced, and reduced almost to nothing, the bounty was not only kept up upon the vessels, but was increased, as it was from 1813 to 1819. The design was not merely to give them the amount of salt duty which they had paid, but it would seem to be rather that the object in keeping the duty on salt at all was in order to meet the expenditure occasioned by this very bounty which they gave upon fishing and fishing vessels for another purpose, and that was for naval purposes, for purposes connected with the defense of the country.

That, sir, is the position I wish to state in the first place in answer to the Senator; because, if I understood his argument, it was founded almost exclusively on that. Certainly he dwelt at most length on it, and with a great deal of plausibility, and with a great deal of force, as it seemed to me, until I came to examine the course of legislation upon the subject, on the idea which has been familiar to those who have attacked this system from the beginning, that this was a mere return of so much duty paid. But when we come to examine as I have examined, and as I have now explained to the Senate, the act of 1792, and particularly the act of 1813, and find that instead of at all basing the matter upon the duty on salt, they gave the allowance, and an increased allowance, upon the tonnage of the vessel, leaving the idea of exportation entirely out of the question, it follows as a matter of necessity that Congress understood perfectly that in continuing this system as they did continue it, they placed it entirely upon another basis, and that one connected with the general interests of the country, separate from any return of duties.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, in order that we may understand each other, and make this issue distinctly?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Does he mean to say that, by the act of 1792, or the act of 1813, it was the purpose of Congress to give more than an equivalent for the duty upon salt? That is the point, and that is what I maintain. The Senator now, to avoid the force of my argument, says that inasmuch as exportation was not the condition of the allowance on tonnage in the act of 1813, therefore Congress intended to give a bounty instead of a drawback, or its equivalent. I hold that that argument is not sound; and I am certain that, according to the declaration of the advocates of this change of the system, and according to the protests of the fishermen themselves, they got no more, sought no more, and Congress meant to give no more, than an equivalent for the drawback of the duty on salt. What I wish to know of the Senator is, whether he means to say that Congress did design to give, or did give, by these acts, more than that equivalent?

Mr. FESSENDEN. What they did in 1792 I have not undertaken to say. They might have intended, as the Senator argued, at that time to make one equal to the other; they might have intended to do the same thing as nearly as they could by the act of 1813; but what I intended to say was, that subsequently they increased the allowance made to the vessels, while the duty on salt was continually decreasing.

Mr. CLAY. I take issue with the Senator there as a matter of fact; and I advertise him and his friends that I will undertake to prove differently.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator himself stated that, in 1830, or thereabouts, when the duty on salt became two cents a pound, the whole allowance granted to fishing vessels continued.

Mr. CLAY. Exactly; but the Senator just now assumed in advance that they increased the allowance with the decrease of the duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say they increased the allowance in 1819 on vessels. Did they increase the duty on salt at the same time?

Mr. CLAY. They did not; but I will undertake to show that the allowance did not then exceed the duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a matter of argument.

Mr. CLAY. A matter of demonstration.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator may be able to show it. It will make no difference, however, in the argument I adduced. I stated that, in 1813, they adjusted it; they gave the allowance at that time without reference at all to exportation. The Senator has argued that it amounted to just about the duty. It may be so. I have not examined that fact, because for the purposes of my argument it is not necessary. In 1819 they increased the allowance, and did not increase the duty; and thenceforward the duty on salt fell down to two cents, according to the Senator's own statement, while the allowance granted in 1819 continued and has continued down to the present day, and no sort of alteration whatever has been made in reference to this matter.

I say, then, that the change of the principle on which it was based, if originally based on the principle assumed by the Senator, was made in 1813; it was manifested more strongly in 1819; and the continuance of the allowance made, and a larger allowance made in 1819, if the Senator pleases, from that period down to the present time, while the duty on salt has become nominal, shows conclusively that Congress, since that period, has not considered that the duty on salt had anything to do with it, whatever might be the original foundation. It has continued, and it has not continued silently. This matter has been mooted in Congress over and over again. Repeated attempts have been made to repeal the fishing bounties—repeated attempts have been made to repeal them since the duty on salt has become merely nominal, and yet they have been continued by Congress. Why? It must have been upon some ground. It could not have been upon the ground that it was drawback. What was the reason which has actuated this Government from the year 1813, or 1819, down to the present time? There must have been some reason. It is perfectly manifest it was based upon an entirely different idea and a different principle, and that was the principle that the continuance of this bounty was necessary in order to some other purpose of the Government than that for which, if the Senator pleases still so to assert, it was originally imposed, and, although there might have been this reason given in the beginning, it is manifest that a different principle and foundation have been assumed since. That is what I say.

Congress abandoned the system in 1807; that is, in 1807 two things took place—the duty on salt was repealed, and the allowance made to fishing vessels was repealed. Now, it is worth while for us to consider what the effect of that was. It is of some consequence for us to know why the bounty was restored in 1813. There was a period then when the original system of simply giving drawback was abandoned, if, in 1807, it stood upon that basis. The duty was then repealed; the drawback or the bounty or the allowance, properly called, was repealed with it. When the year 1813 came, the whole matter was restored, not to its original basis of drawback, but the basis which I have now explained under the statute, and that was, of imposing a duty on salt, but at the same time making an allowance to fishing vessels of a sum equivalent to, or greater or less than, the duty, as the case might be, without reference at all to the question whether the fish was exported or not. It is clear, then, that it was not laid at that time with reference to exportation.

Now, the question arises, why was it restored? In order to come to that question it is necessary to consider, somewhat, the history of the times. The year 1813 was a period of war. War had existed at the time of the passage of that bill for a year or more. I do not remember the exact time, nor is it material. During the period which had elapsed from 1807 to 1813, this country had had some experience. What was that experience? In the first place, during that period the fisheries had declined. The amount of fish exported in 1813, at the time of the passage of that act, compared with the amount of fish exported the year the duty and allowances were repealed, was very small. The amount of tonnage employed in the fisheries was, comparatively, very small. It had fallen down to almost nothing, as the tables will show. I have examined them, and I have them here; but I will not trouble the Senate to read the details. The amount of exported fish, at that time, was very trifling; the amount of tonnage was almost nothing.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In making the comparison now, he gives us a comparison between the year 1807 and the year 1813. The year 1813 was a war year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It had been gradually declining.

Mr. BENJAMIN. What was it in 1811, before the war broke out, compared with 1807?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will show. The dried fish exported in 1807 was 473,924 quintals. It fell off from that time; and in 1811 it was 214,387—less than half. In 1812, it was down to 169,619, and in 1813 to 63,016; in 1814, 31,310, and so it ran down. It ran down one half during a time of peace. During all these years, the amount of tonnage was decreasing; the amount of fish exported was also decreasing to a certain extent. In time of war, of course it went down to a very small sum; in 1812, we had several naval battles. The first great battle that was fought, according to my recollection, was between the Constitution and Guerriere, which excited the attention of the country; and it is a matter of history, perfectly well known to every one familiar with the naval annals of the country, that the Constitution was manned almost exclusively by Cape Cod fishermen. The praises which that crew received from the commander, and from all who knew anything about the history of our naval battles, are also familiar to the whole country who read the history. The Constitution was manned by these men almost exclusively through the war; and a great number of the men, on several other of our vessels, who fought the naval battles of the country, were from New England, and the greater portion of them from the fisheries. A great number of our privateers were also manned by the same class of people; and what did the country learn then? The country learned then, the moment they came to have naval battles and to see the necessity of having both privateersmen and ships of war, the value of these men as sailors. They found, too, by previous experience, that these men had been reduced to a small number in consequence of the decay of the fisheries occasioned by the repeal of the bounty. They then learned two things: in the first place, that it was a business that required encouragement in order to keep it up; and in the second place, that it was a business that, when encouraged, furnished a class of men absolutely essential to the naval glory of the country, absolutely essential to the naval service in time of war.

Well, sir, all this experience did not go for nothing. The men of those days learned wisdom from experience. They were not frightened by the term "bounty," or frightened by the term "allowance." They saw, from experience derived from the actual history of the business itself, that in order to keep that business prosperous, there must be some encouragement afforded by the Government, on account of the very nature of it. They saw that if that business was encouraged by the Government, it would give us, in time of war, a class of men absolutely essential for the purposes of the Government for the objects of naval warfare. They saw, too, that in time of war, if that class of men did actually exist, if they were kept in that pursuit, and had not, in the mean time, gone into other pursuits of different character, from the necessity of the case—as war would almost invariably put an end to the fishing to any considerable extent—these men must resort to the Navy in order to obtain subsistence as good as that which they had been in the habit of receiving in time of peace. These considerations had their effect, and the result was the act of 1813, passed in a time of war. Congress then imposed a duty on imported salt, and, at the same time, they gave this allowance—not, as I said before, making this allowance payable on fish exported, but payable upon the tonnage of the vessel, whether the fish were exported or not—placing it, therefore, on a distinct, substantial ground, and a ground which cannot be explained or defended on the positions assumed by the honorable Senator from Alabama in his speech. As the war continued, these matters became more and more apparent. The allowance itself was a small one, and the consequence was that, in 1819, after the termination of the war, the allowance made to vessels under these circumstances was increased, and that increased allowance has continued from that time down to the present, although the policy has been repeatedly attacked, as I before stated.

Another objection which has been made by the honorable Senator, although not urged at very great length, is, that these bounties, as he calls them, are unconstitutional. He cited several provisions of the Constitution in support of the ground which he took, but I am hardly willing to believe that, as a lawyer, he is ready to place his objection on either of these clauses. They are printed in italics on the ninth page of his pamphlet speech:

"The Constitution declares that 'direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; that 'no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census; and that 'all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.'"

Now, can he bring this allowance made to fishing vessels under either of these heads? Is it a direct tax, is it a duty, an impost, or an excise? Does it come within either of these descriptions? The Senator will hardly contend that it does. At any rate, it must be so manifest to everybody that none of these provisions applies to the case he touches in any particular that I shall not trouble myself to reply, or to imagine an argument where, I think, the Senator can hardly find one.

But, sir, he goes further, and places it on the ground of inequality and injustice. With regard to inequality, I can only repeat what I suggested to him the other day. Because an allowance, or a tax, or a burden of any description is unequal in its operation, it does not follow that it becomes necessarily unconstitutional. There is hardly any duty that we impose which can be said to be equal in its operation on all sections of the country. The only thing that is necessary is, that there should not be anything in the imposition itself, whatever that may be, that necessarily, from the terms and provisions of the act, renders it unequal in its operation upon different classes. How it will operate in effect is another question. Why, sir, we impose duties upon certain articles by way of protection—to raise revenue, to be sure, but operating as a protection. For the purpose of raising revenue, it will operate harder upon one section than another. Is it, therefore, unconstitutional? The Senator will hardly contend that it is so. He cannot answer, I take it, the illustration that I gave him. The question I put to him is whether, because one particular section of the country consumes more of an article in proportion to the number of the people, per capita, than another section of the country, a duty imposed upon that article would be unconstitutional on account of its unequal operation. Nobody will contend that it is. Is it unconstitutional because unjust in its operation? Who is to be the judge of that? Somebody must decide. It must be decided by the power which makes the imposition. Congress, which lays the duty, must decide whether it will be unjust in its operation or not. Could a court settle that question? Could you carry a question of that kind before a court, and undertake to prove by evidence adduced at the bar that a duty operates unjustly upon different sections of the country—a duty laid or a bounty granted? No, sir. The argument, if addressed to us simply as a reason for the repeal of the bounty, that it is unjust in its operation, might be a very good argument if there were nothing to reply to it; if there were no considerations of public policy to adduce by way of answer, it might be an argument that would address itself decidedly to the understanding and the sense of right of every man; but it is not an argument to be addressed to the constitutionality of the bounty. That is a question to be settled by the power which has authority to make the imposition, whatever the imposition may be.

The power to impose a bounty of this kind may rest either upon the commercial or the war power. Where does the honorable Senator find the power in the Constitution to give bounties to soldiers who enlist for a certain specific time, or for enlisting at all? It is in the power which is given to Congress to raise armies, and to do everything that is necessary in order to raise an army for the defense of the country. Where does the Senator find the power, which was exercised during the last war, of giving a bounty to privateersmen, paying a certain sum of money for every prisoner taken by a privateer? It is derived from the same power, the war power—or the naval power, if you please—which is given to Congress.

This, sir, may very well come under the same head. Where do you find the power to establish a naval school? Under the power to create a navy; and will you not find the same power to establish a school for seamen that you do to establish a school for officers? and it makes no sort of difference how you do it. The mode in which the object is to be effected must be left to Congress. Congress must decide a question of that kind. You may do it as well in one place as another, in one mode as another. If the thing itself is essential to effect the purpose which you desire to accomplish, and the power is given to effect that general purpose, the mode in which it is to be done is to be left to Congress, which has the power.

It may come also under the head of regulating commerce, though on that I do not deem it necessary to enlarge. It is a power that has always been used under our Government with reference to war purposes. Bounties can be as well given to sailors as to soldiers; schools may as well be established for sailors as for soldiers. There is no distinction. The principle is the same, and the manner is one to be ascertained wisely by those who have the power to do the thing itself.

It is, then, sir, a question merely of the expediency of giving bounties in this case as in all others; and the question presents itself to Congress in this light precisely: is it expedient? Does the good of the country justify the thing? As a general system, I am averse to bounties; I am averse to pensions; I am averse to all these things that lay a burden upon the State, whatever they may be. I vote for them, but I vote for them on the ground of public expediency, of public necessity, because, to carry on any Government, we must do all that is necessary to accomplish the great purposes of that Government; and if we cannot so well do what we wish in any other way, the mode which is most proper, most economical, and most easy, is to be adopted. As a general rule, I wish we could dispense with all; but I cannot, as a legislator, overlook this great principle, that we are to be governed by the necessities of the case in all instances; that we are to consider what the great interests of the country demand, and see whether a matter which we would willingly avoid must be submitted to for the attainment of a great end. That is the only difference which ought to guide us under the Constitution, and I do not contend that on any occasion we should violate any of the provisions of that instrument to accomplish any good.

Then, sir, if that is a correct principle, and if I have properly stated the foundation of this matter, the question arises simply as to the necessity in this case, whether it actually exists, whether it is wise, expedient, well for the country, under the circumstances, that this allowance should be continued. Sir, the sum is not a large one, and I shall not trouble myself to talk about it; for if the allowances ought to be repealed, we must repeal them—that is all.

The Senator from Alabama denied that these bounties have the effect to provide a class of sailors, and he went into an exposition of his views upon the subject, derived from some aid that he got from some quarter—he did not tell us what—to show that in reality they had no effect to provide the very class which they profess to provide. His error consisted in supposing that the fishermen, the very men whose numbers we wish to keep up, are the same kind of men with those employed in our merchant vessels and in our whaling ships. My colleague has shown in his argument that about nine tenths I believe, certainly eight tenths, of all the sailors employed in our merchant vessels and whaling vessels are foreigners.

Mr. CLAY. He said two thirds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not recollect what he said, but I know what he showed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Two thirds and upwards.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Two thirds, I think, in our ships of war, and a much larger proportion in our whaling vessels and merchant marine. Let me say to the Senator that the American sailors who constitute the remainder, whatever their number may be, as a general rule, are a portion of these fishermen, educated originally in the fisheries. Leaving them out of the question, these fishermen are not sailors in the common sense of the word. They do not get their living by going to sea; that is not the great pursuit of their lives. They do not live upon the sea. Their home is not upon the deep. Their home is on the land; and yet they are a very peculiar class of people. They are born on the shores of the Atlantic; they are accustomed to the water from their earliest boyhood. The first thing they learn to do is to sail a boat, and they follow up that acquaintance with the water as long as they live and are able to exert their bodily powers at all.

But, sir, notwithstanding that, they have homes; generally the older members of the profession, if I may call them so, have a little patch of land. There is their home; there is their family. They have wives and children. They go to sea in this fishing business—not, as I said before, for the purpose of acquiring homes upon the deep, as sailors usually do; but for the purpose of helping out their ordinary modes of livelihood. After a while, the father, who has been in the fishing business for a considerable period of years, retires; he cultivates his piece of land, if he has been able to purchase one, more or less, and his sons, as they get old enough, engage on board the fishing boats. They grow up in that business, and the pay they get from the sale of their fish, enables them to help out the family living. They continue in it very frequently through their lives, following up the business of fishing at some seasons of the year; or some of them become attached to a seafaring life, and become sailors. Most of them do not, however, and for very good reasons. Our merchant service now offers no sort of attraction to such men. In the first place, as my colleague stated, the employment of foreigners has generally driven American sailors out of the service for the reason that they are of such a class that New England men, brought up with New England ideas, habits, and notions, will not permit their sons in early life to associate with them. The pursuit is one necessarily demoralizing, of following the sea in foreign voyages, and making it an exclusive profession. If they go, it is because they are ambitious, and not with the design of remaining before the mast all their lives, but for the purpose of rising to rank in sea service; and the consequence is that a large proportion of the mates and masters of the merchant vessels, and of your finest clipper ships that sail from the northern ports, are men who were originally fishermen. Some of the most capable men, most able to navigate vessels, most able to manage voyages, to dispose of cargoes, and conduct matters in that branch of business with great sagacity and skill, are men who began life as fishermen, and as boys in the business.

Well, sir, these men are not out, as the Senator supposed, simply four months in the year. He asked the question, will not a man who goes off for three years on a whaling voyage, learn more than one who goes simply for four months in a year to catch cod fish? Why, sir, they are at sea constantly during the year. They make a voyage, they come back, stay at home a while, long enough to dispose of their cargoes, and then make another voyage, and so on. The boys spend the winter at home, because they go to school. In spring they are off again for a certain period, when they are not engaged in the labor of cultivating the piece of land with which they are connected.

That is the class of men. But the Senator asks, can they learn seamanship in that way? Do not they know all about vessels? Why, sir, if the Senator knew anything about our coast, if he knew anything about the long line of coast running along Massachusetts and Maine and New Hampshire, he would know that there is hardly a creek or a stream which empties into the ocean, or is connected with the ocean, on which vessels are not being built constantly in seasons of prosperity. They are perfectly familiar with vessels of the largest class from their childhood. They are all over them. They know all about them. They become acquainted with them from absolute necessity; they are perfectly familiar with them. Now, however, we are told that these men are not acquainted with ships, and not capable of making sailors! What is necessary? All that is requisite is that they should acquire the strength and the hardihood that is necessary to enable them to carry on the business in which they are engaged.

Well, sir, is it a light matter? Does not the Senator know, do not Senators understand, that this cod fishing on the banks in these very fishing vessels is about the most dangerous navigation in the world? They go down on the dangerous banks; and in that region where they go for the purpose of taking cod fish—not mackereling, but engaged in this very business—they are constantly exposed to fogs and to storms; northerners, as they are called, are frequent; the men are in continual danger; it is a life requiring strength and nerve, and calculated to give strength and nerve and hardihood. From personal observation, I can assert that there is not such a body of men anywhere to be found, within my knowledge, for personal hardihood and endurance and courage. Their very life is one constantly exposed to danger. Their daily habit is one of toil, and of toil in the midst of danger, and requiring presence of mind, courage, and coolness, such as are required in hardly any other occupation in the world; and they follow this up from boyhood. The consequence is, that when their country calls for them, there is a class of men of precisely the character that is needed, as our naval officers of the last war found—hardy men, strong men, brave men, resolute men; and men, too, who from having a home and a stake in the country, fight for it, with all the zeal and all the ardor that those having the largest stake in the country and animated by the strongest emotions of patriotism feel on any occasion. Why, sir, the glory of their ships and of their country is more to them than to those who live on land, and who, however proud they may feel of the exploits of our Navy, have not that personal interest in it which those who are actually engaged in it must feel. And yet, sir, the Senator tells us that he learns from some persons—I do not know who they are, some modern gentlemen—that, in their opinion, these men have much to unlearn; that they cannot be made sailors of. Why, sir, experience has shown that they are the very best sailors in the world. This is the concurrent testimony of everybody who has had any familiarity with them; and it is not enough to read articles from one or two papers, owned and published and edited by custom-house officers in Massachusetts—

Mr. CLAY. I must correct the Senator. His colleague made that charge here the other day. I then denied it upon my best impressions, but he very positively asserted that they were custom-house officers. He named Mr. Bates and Mr. Spinney. I took occasion this morning to go and ascertain the fact, and at the time these statements were made, neither of these men was a custom-house officer, and one of them is not at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In regard to one of them whom the Senator calls Mr. Spinney, I know he was. I think his name is Finney. The other man I do not know anything about.

Mr. CLAY. At the time these publications were made, as I was assured, on an inspection of the record in the Treasury Department, neither of them was a custom-house officer.

Mr. HAMLIN. If my colleague will allow me, I desire to say that I was informed by a gentleman residing in Massachusetts, a member of the other House, that they were both connected with the revenue,—not that they were collectors; and that was my authority for the statement. I knew one of the men personally, and I knew he had been a collector at Barnstable. I knew him well.

Mr. CLAY. Such was not the fact when these publications were made, as I am assured at the Treasury Department, after examination.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, wherever it comes from, I know that it is untrue. I know that their statements are untrue, because I have talked with many men of the highest character and reputation with reference to all this matter, over and over again, and I have the positive assurance as to the character of these men as sailors; that they make the best in the world, and are most readily found. Why, sir, there is a member of the other House who knows all about this matter, perfectly well. I know that if a vessel about to sail from one of our ports can get a crew made up of fishermen, it will give very much higher wages, and can go for less amount of insurance than ordinarily. I have occasion to know something about the American sailor, as contradistinguished from the foreigner, in my own experience. I once had occasion to send a son of mine as a passenger on board a vessel to make a long voyage. I applied to the master, and he recommended his vessel to me as perfectly well calculated for it, and he gave this reason: Said he, "I have a crew of twenty-five men in the whole, and if your son comes on board"—he was then a young man—"there will, with myself, and mate, and men, be ten Americans, and we can then take care of any difficulty that we may have with these foreigners on board."

There is another point which presents itself, and which is material. I have spoken of the necessity. Now, is the bounty an inducement? Is the business a poor one, in other words? Does it pay without the bounty? Does the bounty have any effect in keeping the business up? I have adverted to one argument on that point by showing how the business fell from 1807 to 1813.

Mr. CLAY. But the Senator omitted to mention that that was partly under the influence of the embargo act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that existed for a short time, but it did not exist for all the period.

Mr. CLAY. It existed in 1808.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It commenced at that time. I will avail myself of the testimony the Senator read from one of these newspapers, in order to show what the character of the business is. On the twelfth page of his speech he cites the Barnstable Patriot to this effect:

"Whilst it affords to the foreigner an opportunity to acquire seamanship, it encourages our own young men into the fisheries, who would otherwise enter immediately into the merchant service, where they would learn twice or thrice as fast. Besides, the boy who once becomes a fisherman is often led to embrace it as a profession for life—a business the poorest, the hardest, the worst of almost any under the light of the sun."

I have shown, I think, the exceeding value of these men, the necessity that the country is under of encouraging them; and I take this as an answer to my second question, "is the nature of the business such that it can sustain itself?" The writer here says—and upon that point he might judge—that it is the hardest and poorest and worst business of any under the light of the sun. The Senator, in the estimate that he made the other day, took from Mr. Scudder's speech a statement of an average of some sixty or seventy dollars a year received in the whole by the common fishermen. In late years the outside estimate of all that a man makes by going fishing in the ordinary season is within $150. Now, to Senators, that may look like a very small sum. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama does not know—many cannot understand—that $150 to a certain class of men is of any importance. It makes a large portion of their livelihood. Taken in connection with what they can get from the soil, it becomes important. Is the twenty dollars important? I believe eighteen or twenty dollars is about the amount received from these allowances.

The Senator argued that the fisherman never received the benefit of this. He is entirely mistaken. The fisherman has always received it. He may not receive it in the shape of bounty paid out at the end of the voyage? Why? Let us look a little to see what the nature of this business is, and what the nature of the men is. These people who go to sea as boys, who engage in this business, the hardest and poorest of any under the light of the sun, have no capital to commence with but their hands. They want a chance on board a fishing vessel. They have been brought up perhaps in open boats, in the in-shore fishing, as it is called. It is important for them to get a chance to earn something to support the family; perhaps another member may stay at home. What is the inducement? What has he got to do? Capitalists have very little inducements to enter into this business, because its profits are always small. Even taking the eleven per cent. which the Senator made out as a profit in one year, and making all proper deductions—and he did not make all proper deductions—that is a very small sum when you take into consideration that another year a man may make nothing; he may lose his whole venture; a storm sometimes sweeps away the vessel. It is all a matter of uncertainty. It is not a thing that pays. You cannot go on board a fishing vessel as you can on board a whaling vessel, and start out to the Pacific ocean, and be gone three years, with abundance of capital, and almost a certainty that in the course of the cruise you will meet with what you desire; and if you do meet it you have large profits in return. And that is the difference between the common cod fishing and the whale fishery. In the first place, the cod fishing is infinitely more dangerous than whaling. The dangers of whaling arise simply from the capture of the creature itself. The exposure to storms in the regions where the whalers go is very slight, while the cod fisherman is continually exposed to storms and fogs.

Again, the size of a ship in whaling prevents the danger. As I said before, the profits of a whaling voyage, if that voyage is only moderately successful, are large, and capitalists are ready enough to invest in it and have invested in it and made it the most profitable business in the world; for the city of New Bedford is the richest city, in proportion to its population, of any city on this continent, simply from the profits of whale fishing. But the profits of the ordinary cod fishery are so small that it is difficult to get capitalists to invest in it at all, and they do not, except in connection with other business of larger description, and for the sake of accommodation and keeping their hands in all kinds of business connected with the sea.

A fisherman wants to get a chance on board of one of these vessels. How does he go? He goes on shares; that is the nature of the voyage. What must he do? In the first place he must get a vessel; he must have his outfit; he must pay his share of the outfit. How is a voyage got up? A man who owns a vessel, if none of the sailors are rich enough to own it, turns out his vessel and the crew immediately. It must be fitted out. Who is to do it? They have no money. He has to do it. He furnishes the outfit. The fishermen go aboard on shares; they catch the fish; they bring them back; they place them in the hands of the owner of the vessel. He receives them; he disposes of them; he makes an account; he charges each man with his outfit, and he charges him also with his share of the proceeds of the fishing voyage, and he credits him with the amount of bounty which he receives, and he holds the bounty as security for his advance. That is the ordinary course of fishing voyages.

Suppose those young men who thus begin life and are thus aided, do not receive the money directly, they receive the benefit in all cases. There is not a fisherman on our shores who does not know perfectly well what he is entitled to, by way of bounty. How is he to be cheated out of it? He may be possibly be cheated out of it in the way of trade, but he sees that it is accounted for. It is always brought into the account and made a charge. It is credited in connection with the supplies with which he is charged and his portion of the proceeds. That is the way these voyages are got up generally, and I have formed some familiarity with the matter from my practice as a lawyer. A young man goes on board one of these vessels in that way. Suppose him to be fortunate and make something and be enabled to lay up something. After two or three voyages he may have a few hundred dollars. His neighbors about him may be as well off as he is. He may perhaps find a dozen or twenty young fishermen, in his neighborhood, who have also laid up a few hundred dollars. They put them together and they build a little fishing smack. They divide it into sixteenth parts, or thirty-second parts, or sixty-fourth parts, and some of them will take it and go fishing. They divide the profits in the same way. One of them is ship's husband and stays at home. Sometimes a man gets to be the owner of a fishing smack himself, and if he has great skill in financiering and great luck, he may get to be a rich man; but where one of them gets to be an owner of fishing property, thousands of them own nothing, but only make from year to year enough to help out their livelihood, proving the truth of what this writer says that it is the poorest and hardest business on the face of the earth. And prosperous men may go out of it, as I said before, mates of merchant ships, masters of clipper ships. Some of the greatest men in our mercantile marine and who have made it what it is, have grown from boys who began life as boys on board a fishing smack, and also some of our richest merchants have come from the same origin.

Now, sir, suppose what the Senator stated to be true in reference to the profits that may be made in a single year; those profits, from his own showing, accrue to the owner of the vessel, to those who own the tonnage, and exclusively to them. What becomes of the fisherman? If he is cheated, if he is defrauded, the more need he has of encouragement, the more need he has of aid. But, sir, my answer to all this statement is, that the Senator's own speech shows, the citations which he makes from the public prints show, the very nature of the business shows from necessity, that this bounty has been and will continue to be of material aid in accomplishing the purpose for which it was allowed. The question then, as I said before, returns to precisely where it was when I first stated it: is the object to be accomplished a valuable one, and if that object is a valuable one; then, is the sacrifice the Government makes to attain that object too great?

Mr. President, the fact cannot be concealed. Senators, if they have examined the history of the country, (and I have no doubt they have,) must admit it, that if you are to have naval battles fought hereafter, if you are to have war with great naval Powers, and are to retain your standing upon the ocean, those battles must be fought mainly by New England men. We are a people accustomed to the sea. Our location is such for the largest portion of our territory that we are necessarily exposed to it, and accustomed to it, and familiar with it, all its dangers, all its enterprises, from boyhood up. There is where you must find your sailors. I hope, hereafter, you will find a portion of your officers there. The officers generally come from this section of the country; but it is there you must find your sailors. You may get a soldier anywhere in this country—go to any section of it if you please; there is no difference. We are a brave people. Everybody admits that. The stock we come of is such that we could not be otherwise than brave. A soldier is easily made, and is easily found. It is not so with the sailor. A sailor must be educated from his boyhood. He must be accustomed to the sea from early life; and not only that, but you must have a man who is capable not only of doing on board a vessel the duties which belong to the ordinary sailor, but you must have a man who is actuated by the same spirit that your soldiers are when you come to fight your battles.

The question is, as I said before, whether the country is ready to say, in view of all these facts, about which there can certainly be no dispute, for experience has proved them, that the sum we pay for the purpose of educating such men, and keeping this reserve corps of fighting men on hand, is really too great to pay for it, and that it would be better and wiser to let all these fisheries run down, and the men go into other pursuits, travel away from the ocean, become agriculturists or mechanics, or engage in any other pursuit to which they could lay their hands to give them a livelihood, rather than encourage in them the love of the pursuit towards which their ideas have been turning from their earliest boyhood, and which has been the pursuit of their ancestors from generation to generation.

I have very little more to say on this subject, Mr. President, because, as I said before, the matter was so entirely exhausted by my colleague that it really left me nothing to say. But there are one or two points more which were suggested by the honorable Senator from Alabama which need a word. He stated, towards the close of his speech, that this system was demoralizing, because he said he could prove from the records that it was attended with a great degree of fraud. He did not give us that proof; he waited for the assertion to contradict it. If he had really desired—I am speaking to him now as a matter of argument, not making any personal allusion which would be unpleasant to him—if he had really desired that the truth should be eliminated from this examination, why did he not let us know what his testimony was, in order that we might have an opportunity to comment upon it? Why does he reserve it for the closing speech which he claims for himself as a matter of courtesy? Why keep back the testimony on which he founds his assertions and declare his intention of speaking last, when, according to parliamentary rules, we can have no opportunity to reply to him or comment on the testimony upon which he so much relies?

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will tell him promptly it was because it was so voluminous that I did not wish to tax the patience of the Senate or fatigue myself with reading it. I will say to him, though, that the communications of all the collectors from Eastport to New Bedford represent that the bounties obtained are in fraud of the Treasury and in violation of the law. The petition of the fishermen themselves of Gloucester, as I will read it, alleges that they cannot comply with the regulations of the Department without losing more than they can realize in the bounty, that they had better abandon the bounty than undertake to pursue the regulations laid down by the Department—regulations which are as old as these laws; and that I thought was sufficient evidence. I have too the evidence here of forty-odd vessels engaged in catching fresh fish for the market of New York, a few years ago, all of which obtained bounty under a cod-fish license as certified by the collectors. I did not present it because of the time it would occupy. The papers are at the service of the Senator or any of his colleagues. What the Secretary of the Treasury says he says upon the warrant of testimony furnished to that Department which would make a folio as large as the largest family Bible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to ask him how recently that testimony has been taken?

Mr. CLAY. It has been furnished for a series of years past. I have gone back myself to the time of General Taylor's Administration, and to the time when Mr. Corwin was Secretary of the Treasury. Complaints were made to Mr. Corwin about the rigid enforcement of these regulations, especially in respect to the taking of fresh fish; and the fishermen of Gloucester, in Massachusetts, as I will show, declared that they could not comply with the regulations, without sinking more money than they realized in the way of bounty; and they said they had better throw away their bounty than throw over their fresh fish. I will state to the Senator, moreover, as I may take occasion to use it in concluding this debate, that the same assertions are made by Mr. Zeno Scudder in his speech, in 1852, in defense of the fisheries. He there maintains that you cannot comply with the regulations of the Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I happen to know all about that. It is difficult, undoubtedly, to comply with the regulations of the Department; but I am speaking of fraud. What the Senator has just presented does not necessarily involve fraud. Fraud consists, I suppose, in attempting to get the bounty in fraud of the spirit of the law, without having devoted to this pursuit the time required by the law.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. They go on to allege specific instances of fraud, as I have stated in the case of forty vessels a few years ago that supplied the New York market with fresh fish, and yet realized the bounty. But here is the dilemma which I will present to the Senator, and he may take either horn he pleases: the fishermen of Gloucester, in their memorial to the Secretary of the Treasury, declare that they had better give up the bounties than yield the fresh fish trade; that if they are obliged to throw over their fresh fish which they catch in a voyage in order to realize the bounty, they had better abandon the bounty than throw away the fish, for they say the fresh fish yield a better profit than the salt-cured cod, and yet I say these vessels realized the bounty. If they realized the bounty, they did so, according to their own memorial, by a pecuniary sacrifice; they sunk more money to get the bounty than they would have made if they had abandoned the bounty. Now, is it supposable that they did so?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely what I expected to call out from the Senator; and I have a perfectly conclusive answer to the whole of it. The answer is that the Department mistook the law; and it has been so decided by Judge Woodbury. His decision has been published, and may be found and read—a long, labored decision. The original statute said that they should not engage in any other business than cod fishing; and if they did, they became liable to a penalty, and forfeited their bounties, and forfeited their vessels. It was held by the Department that if a vessel fitted out for cod fishing, in the course of its cruise came across a school of mackerel, it could not stop and catch a few barrels of mackerel; but if they did, they engaged in another business, lost their bounty, and forfeited their vessel.

Mr. CLAY. Do I understand the Senator to say that that was no violation of the law?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That, I say, was held by the Department to be a violation of the law.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator deny that it was?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly I do, because it has been judicially decided so.

Mr. CLAY. Then the judge who decided it did so in the very teeth of the statute and in violation of its express language; because the bounty is for catching cod fish, and for being engaged a certain period of time, not less than four months, in catching cod fish.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand all that; but still, the Senator is mistaken, and the Department were mistaken. They put on the law the construction that if a vessel which had taken out a license for cod fishing started off, and in the course of its cod-fishing voyage came across a school of mackerel, it could not stop for any length of time to take mackerel; and if it did, it forfeited the vessel and its license, because it was engaging in another business. That was held in terrorem over the fishermen for years. They said, however, "all this business is very uncertain; we mean to devote honestly four months to fishing for cod fish; we mean to give all that time; we will do it; but if, in the course of our voyage, we come across a chance to fill the barrels on board with mackerel, or any other fish that is valuable, shall we refuse to do so for the reason that we are engaged in another as a main business, and may have to extend our voyage somewhat over the four months to make out the four months' fishing for cod?" That was their reasoning. They said they relied upon the cod fishery; it was important to them; they could not give it up; but that frequently their cod fishing voyage was a failure, and that they might make up their loss by coming across mackerel, and filling their vessels with mackerel.

That question arose just before Judge Woodbury's death. A large fleet of fishing vessels—some dozen or more—were seized and carried into Newport, and the district judge condemned them. The owners took an appeal to the circuit court, and Judge Woodbury reversed the decree. He said that there was no fraud in it; that it was a matter of time; and suppose they did fit out and take a license for cod fishing: all the law required was that they should honestly devote four months to cod fishing, and it was unreasonable to require them to pass by this wealth that was floating on the water, and not pick it up and avail themselves of it because they had taken out a cod-fishing license. From that day to this, the practice has been in accordance with Judge Woodbury's decision.

These are the great frauds which are pretended to be set up! Why, sir, it was not long before I came away that a revenue cutter brought two or three vessels, seized under similar circumstances, into the town where I live. They went before the court, and I understand they have been discharged. They had barrels on board for the mackerel fishery. Cod fishing was the great business, but they took on board materials for mackerel. A different gear and a different bait are used; and they had on board their vessels a sufficient number of barrels for any quantity of mackerel they might take. They were seized, brought in, and discharged. Judge Woodbury said the question was one of intention: did they, under the guise of a cod-fishing voyage, mean a mackerel voyage? It is very frequently the case that they go out fitted for cod fishing and mackerel, and they spend the whole time fishing for mackerel, and catch no cod at all, and then when they come in they do not apply for bounty. The fraud is in undertaking one business under pretense of being engaged in another, and then obtaining bounty which they have not earned. All this charge has been upset by the courts; and all the documents the Senator has collected—his great pile, which it will take him so long to read, have been completely overturned by the decision of the judge of the circuit court.

Mr. CLAY. That is only a tithe part of the frauds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have got one tithe. What are the others?

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator wants to hear them, I will read some specifications.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt there has been cheating in that business, as in all other kinds of business; but it is not committed by the fishermen—those whom we are looking out for.

Mr. CLAY. First, in respect to the agreement which the law requires shall be made between the master and crew, and indorsed by the owner. The common testimony of the various collectors—I read from the report of Mr. J. Ross Browne—

Mr. FESSENDEN. A man who was laughed at, and humbugged, and made fun of all the way down.

Mr. CLAY. Perhaps he may have been laughed at by those in the fishing business, but what he said is proved to be true.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He went to the collectors and got just such stories as he wanted.

Mr. CLAY. But it is corroborated by the advocates of the fisheries who protest against the repeal of the bounties. It is corroborated by the report of the collector at Boston, who maintained in the same report that the bounties were indispensable for the sustenance of the fisheries, and indispensable for the preservation of this "nursery of seamen." So, too, all the collectors from whom I quoted, and transcripts of whose letters I have here sustain these assertions throughout. Hence, if this is laughed at, in like manner the reports of all these collectors must be laughed at; and if this is false, they are all guilty of falsehood; and the way in which the Senator must vindicate the fishermen from the imputation of obtaining these bounties in fraud of the law is by imputing malicious and wicked falsehood for no purpose whatever that I can see, wanton falsehood to the several collectors in his own State, as well as in the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire.

In respect to the provision of the law, in regard to the agreement, Mr. Browne says, that "whatever importance may be attached to this as a means of protection to the owners, it is practically of very little avail to the crew in the distribution of bounty allowances." That is corroborated by the admissions of the fishermen themselves, as I am prepared to show. The law requires, as I interpret it, and as it has been interpreted at the Department from the time it was enacted, that this bounty shall be divided in proportion to the fish caught by each man during his season, and that the division of the proceeds of the voyage shall be in the like ratio—in proportion to the fish caught by each man; yet I have here, in the memorials of some of the owners of fishing vessels, the declaration that they do not divide the proceeds of the voyage in that way, but that the owners of a vessel take one half, and the other half is divided equally among the crew. There is a violation of the law, which the Senator says it is absurd to charge, reported by one person, who he says was laughed at by the fishermen; but who is corroborated not only by the collectors, but by the admissions of the owners of the fishing vessels themselves.

Then, in respect to the seamen, he says, "three fourths of the crew are required, under the act of 1817, to be American seamen." I do not so interpret the law, as I may take occasion hereafter to show. The law does not use the word "citizens," but persons not owing foreign allegiance." I have read from the testimony of two newspapers, and I could have adduced others, but I did not retain them; these happened accidentally to be in my secretary, and were brought up. What is stated by Mr. Browne, and by the collectors, is, that the owners of fishing vessels go out upon the coast of the British provinces and there obtain men for half, or little more than half, what they would have to give, or agree to give, to American seamen; and hence they say the bounty does not inure in that respect to American seamen.

Next, as to the examination of the vessel which is required to be made, in order to see that she has a proper outfit, he says, "such examinations are generally understood to be matters of form." Such is the testimony of some of the revenue cutters, one of whose communications I have here, employed a long time upon the coast of New England—the revenue cutter Morris. Again Mr. Browne said:

"Regular journals, or log-books, containing the daily catch of the crew, the date of sailing, the ports entered, and date of return, are required to be kept, and sworn to by the captain, as proof before the collector."

I believe Judge Story decided that it was necessary to keep them.

"If every claimant who testified under oath to the legality of his claim could be depended upon, there would be no occasion for such a complexity of forms. It is well known to officers of the customs that but little importance is attached to an oath by this class of men, in their dealings with the custom-house. Many of these journals or log-books are made up after the voyage, without reference to time lost or fraudulently employed, and are duly sworn to as authentic records. Nearly every officer of the customs, from Eastport to New Bedford, informs me that this is a practice which they find it very difficult to guard against; and their concurrent testimony justifies the belief that such frauds are of frequent occurrence."

In corroboration of that, Mr. Scudder, in his speech, to which I have frequently alluded, in 1852, adverted to this as one of the unnecessary and harsh requirements of the Department, which he said it was very difficult for them to comply with, and that he did not think the law required it, although, as I understand his decision, Judge Story did decide that it was necessary it should be kept. Then, vessels to be entitled to this bounty, must be exclusively employed in taking cod fish, to be dried or dry-cured during the aggregate period required by law.

"The Department is well aware that applications are made every day by collectors of the customs for new revenue boats, additional boatmen, and increased allowance for repairs, all based upon the necessity of keeping a more rigid guard upon the movements of these fishing vessels. The files of the Department can scarcely contain all the letters that are received, not only from the collectors in the fishing districts, but from the Representatives, Senators, and Governors of the States, complaining of the frauds committed by the fishermen and others, and urging the appointment of additional inspectors, aids to the revenue, and boatmen, and the increase of boats and revenue stations, as the only means of affording protection to the Government."

In corroboration of this statement I avouch the same reports of collectors to the Treasury Department. In some of them they state that a certain revenue cutter may be dispensed with, now that the fishing season is over, and the fishermen are no longer engaged in catching bounty. In another instance they attribute the diminution of the allowance to the fishing vessels, paid out during one year, to the exceeding vigilance of certain revenue officers on the cutters, whereby they detected attempts to defraud the Treasury in the case of a dozen or more fishing vessels that were prevented from realizing the bounty. I have not only the letters of collectors, but I have the letters of men who I suppose are respectable, referring to Senators and Representatives from those States to vouch for their integrity of character, corroborating these statements. As is stated here, the files of the Department can scarcely contain the letters which have been sent to the Department on this subject; and, as I said before, the reason why I did not present them to the Senate was that they were too voluminous, and would occupy too much time; but if the Senator will do as I have done—go to the Department and take the trouble to inspect these letters—he will see that I was not without the warrant of testimony which seemed to be creditable; and that according to all the rules which prevail in courts of justice, I was bound to credit them until they were discredited, to fortify me in the assertion which I made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I attach very little consequence to the statements made by the collectors and revenue officers in relation to this matter. That there are frauds, more or less, committed in this business, as in all other business connected with the revenue, I have no doubt, but I doubt very much whether there are more in this business than in others, in proportion to the number engaged in it. Such things are unavoidable from the nature of men. Bad men, unprincipled men, will get into every business, and they will attempt to commit frauds on the revenue.

But, sir, with reference to these letters let me state one fact which is perfectly well known. It is a great object with every man who is the collector of a port, on the coast of New England especially, as he thinks, to have a revenue boat. He must have a revenue boat with an officer and men under his command. It is very convenient for many purposes. In the first place it increases his patronage and he gets so many more persons to work at elections. Besides, he gets an excellent chance to take a sail himself and he becomes a more important man. Consequently, it has been very much the habit of revenue officers in that section to write such letters, and they get everybody to sustain their applications. We all know how easy it is to get these recommendations from Governors and others, especially of the same political party, and I am not drawing a distinction between the two parties now, as to the necessity of having more aid to prevent frauds on the revenue. It becomes very convenient to charge the fishermen with them. Now let me state a single fact in answer to all this charge. There is a gentleman, a citizen of Maine, now at the head of one of the bureaus in the Treasury Department, who was for many years a Representative from Maine in the other House—a man of intelligence. He was at the head of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives when this matter was first hinted at by the Senator from Alabama, and he told me then that he had investigated the subject, that he had taken the pains to write to every collector in the State of Maine, in regard to the frauds which were alleged, and that he got answers from all of them that they knew of none of any kind of consequence. Some slight attempts had been made but nothing that amounted to anything. He said he had those letters among his papers and would find them and give them to me in order that I might be ready to meet any statements on that point.

Mr. CLAY. In order to settle this matter will the Senator allow me to read the memorial of owners of fishing vessels themselves? This is one from Newburyport—the first one I lay my hands on—to the Secretary of the Treasury:

"HONORABLE SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, residing in the district of the port of Newburyport, engaged in the fishery, and believing ourselves entitled to the fishing bounty upon the several vessels herein named, herewith present the same to you, praying that instruction may be forwarded to the collector of this port, for the payment of the same, if, upon the examination of our statements, as herein set forth, it shall appear to your honor that we are entitled to the same, agreeable to the usages of other ports and customs of the States; and we herewith make known to you that whereas, by the great change in the fishing since the passage of the act granting bounties for the same; that by a strict construction of the letter of said act, we do not consider it possible that the same should be paid, as we know of no vessel, or class of vessels, engaged in any way in the fishing business, that are not necessitated to take all kinds of fish that they can procure, and that by so doing it has become a mixed fishery; that vessels engaged in the Grand Bank fishery, which is the nearest to an exclusive cod fishing business; that it is the practice to take out and cure other kinds of fish, a great part of which also go to the fishermen, as is also the case with the Cape Shore fishermen, whereby your honor will see that the same has become a mixed fishery, and believing that the spirit of the law having been fully complied with, and a liberal construction of this act entitles us to said bounty allowance, without any fraud upon the Government, and knowing the usages of other ports in Massachusetts, as also in the States of New Hampshire and Maine, bounties are paid to vessels employed in the same manner as ourselves; and wishing for nothing more in the administration of the laws than that the same usage may be accorded to us in Newburyport, and the same interpretation and construction of the law be had by the collector of this port as prevails in Gloucester, Salem, and Marblehead, in our own county of Essex, as well as in other parts of the State.

"And we will herewith state that by the construction of our collector, he having considered the business in which we are engaged, as a mixed fishery, and that it is only an exclusive cod fishing that would give us the bounty, thereby confining himself to strict construction of the letter of the law, (instructions per circular,) and not willing to act upon the spirit and intent with which the same was made, and as we believe the same should be administered to us, and as we know is the usage in other ports, and desiring nothing but the same usage, that we may not be degraded in our employment below our neighbors. We have herein most respectfully made known our complaints, set forth what we consider our just and honest claims, and ask for your favorable consideration of the same.

"To the Hon. JAMES GUTHRIE, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America."

It is signed by the owners of twenty-five fishing vessels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the date of that? Mr. CLAY. January 27, 1854. The Senator may reply to this as he has endeavored to do heretofore, by arguing that the law has been improperly construed by the Department, and that according to the construction put upon it by Mr. Woodbury, they would be entitled to the bounty notwithstanding they had, under a cod-fishing license, taken other fish; but that is on the hypothesis that they were employed four months in the year exclusively in catching cod fish.

I do not understand the Senator to mean, and I do not impute to him that he means, that they have been four months continuously engaged in catching cod fish; but what he means to say is a very nice wire-drawn distinction, such as I do not think the cod fishermen, or any but an astute lawyer, such as he is known to be, would ever prefer in their defense; and that is that although they may go out with a cod-fishing license, under that license they may legitimately take other fish one day, as if they come across a shoal of mackerel, or halibut, or haddock, or any other fish, they may take any of them; and that if they make up for that day by superadding to the four months, that would have expired, a day engaged in catching cod fish, they still come within the bounty. The Senate will mark that these memorialists do not draw that distinction; they do not predicate their claim on that statement; but they maintain that they have pursued a mixed fishery; and though they have taken and cured other fish; though they may have taken fresh fish and brought it to market; though they may have alternated between catching the cod or any other fish as it came in their way, yet they say they are entitled to this bounty.

Then again, sir, the regulations require, to entitle them to this bounty, that they should make, and I believe subscribe an oath, that they have pursued this fishery exclusively for the period of time required by law, four months. Now, can they take that oath? If they do not violate the law, if it is not legal perjury, I ask whether it is not moral perjury, which certainly, in foro conscientie, is just as criminal, if they have pursued another fishery than the cod fishery.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated before that I had no doubt that some frauds were committed in this business as in all other business connected with the Treasury.

Mr. CLAY. I have several others that I may read hereafter, but I am not going to trouble the Senate with them now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose they are of the same character. I do not attach much force to any of them. They are exceedingly nice, finical objections, picked up against a policy which has been pursued by the Government upon great principles for the last forty years, to say the least, in order to accomplish a purpose connected with our Navy, and which the Senator undertakes to upset on the ground that some people connected with it attempt to commit frauds upon the revenue, and receive this bounty when they are not entitled to it, and that officers of the Government complain in consequence. Why, sir, all I have to say is, that if the safeguards are not sufficient, make them stronger. You cannot make all men good as they should be, in any particular business. The question is, is it a sufficient reason to be adduced here for this proposition, that certain representations are made as to attempts to do wrong with reference to the details of this matter? Suppose the provisions of the law, or the particular provisions of the Treasury regulations, in some particular instances are construed differently in one place from what they are construed at the Department and at another: does it therefore follow that the policy itself must be abandoned? No such consequence follows. Evils of this kind are incident to all business, and more especially when connected with a class of men who, although possessing a certain degree of intelligence, are not of the highest intelligence and education.

It has been said that the fishermen are cheated out of the bounty. That is not so. I have explained that. They may not always get the money directly; but if the man gets the benefit of it, if it is divided, what difference does it make? If an owner of a vessel finds that it is absolutely necessary for him to make a particular bargain with the fishermen, what difference does it make if he pays them bounty in the first place, and, in consequence of the agreement made, they pay him back a part of it? They make such a bargain as will suit the interests of all concerned. They are sharp men. They know what can be done. They are not an ignorant class of men who do not know their rights. They understand them as well as any man does his. If the provisions of the law are such in reference to the compensation that they cannot avail themselves of the whole of it from the poverty of the business and want of income and hardships connected with it, that is an argument for increasing the bounty rather than for taking off what there is. The argument of the Senator works the other way. It makes no difference whether they get it in the shape of money or supplies, and it makes no difference in reality in reference to the great principle whether there are these trifling difficulties growing out of the Treasury regulations in relation to the paying over of this allowance, or obtaining of this allowance in some cases. All of us must see sufficient cause for that in the nature of the business. The question in my mind is this: if it was a mere gift, which I would not justify, made to these fishermen because they were poor, I would sweep it all away on the ground the Senator states; but if this is a policy of the Government for a great purpose connected with the Government, then if the objections exist, increase the stringency of your regulations, increase your safeguards, do what you please, but do not abandon the policy because it is subject to some trifling abuses which after all in extent amount to very little. That is the answer which I have to make in reference to all the Senator has said on that subject.

There is one other point remaining to be spoken of. It is the position that has been stated in conversation—whether it was in the argument of the Senator or not I do not know—that, if you take off this bounty, there will be just as much fishing, because the amount of the bounty will be added to the price of the fish. It is said the effect will only be to raise the price, and the amount will fall upon the consumer. That is not true in any sense of the word, and cannot be true. In the first place, this is a food that will not bear a high price. It is neither a necessity nor a luxury. Fish is a peculiar kind of food, as we all know. So far as it is exported, it is exported principally for the Catholic use into Catholic countries. Very little of it goes to Protestant countries, or is sought for there. Very little, comparatively, is used here. Although a desirable article as a change of diet, it is not from its nature and character a kind of diet that will allow of a high price or much increase of price.

Another reason is, that the fishermen in this country are subject to very great competition. That competition is at our own doors, in the British Provinces—people who carry on the business to great advantage, because it does lie immediately at their doors. The price of this article of food must be graduated according to the competition it meets; and, as my colleague stated, we meet that competition in our own markets. The French, from their two points of St. Pierre and Miquelon, absolutely pay a bounty on the exportation of fish brought into the country. They pay $1 90 to their fishermen for every quintal brought into this country, in addition to the bounty they pay in advance. It is perfectly idle to talk about raising the price of fish, and taking that addition to the price from the consumer, when we are subjected to competition of that description, and competition also from those who live in the British Provinces.

I have proved, sir, as I think, these points: first, that the policy of the Government on which these bounties were predicated is a policy of providing a corps of able seamen for the Navy in time of war; second, that that policy has proved effectual, and has been approved by the experience of the country; third, that the continuance of these bounties, from the very nature of the business, is absolutely necessary in order that it should continue for our purposes; and if you take them off, the inevitable consequence, in my belief, as proved by all experience, and derived from the nature of the business, is that it must fall off. The country must be without a sufficient supply of that kind of service in the time of its naval warfare, if that hour arrives. I hope it never will arrive; but if it does, every Senator who hears me knows very well that we shall have occasion for naval service, and that we shall have occasion for seamen to fight our battles on the water; and we shall have occasion for privateers, for I am not one of those who hold that privateering ought to be abolished. I dissent entirely from the doctrine which has been sought to be enforced at the present day, in that regard. I hold that, as a community, privateering forms our most essential and effectual safeguard, in case we should be involved in warfare with any of the great naval Powers of the world. It must be so from the very nature of our institutions: we cannot keep up that immense naval armament that is kept up by the first class Powers of Europe. Our defense must necessarily be in the power which we have with our privateers to sweep the commerce of our enemy from the ocean. It was effectual in the last war; it did more than even our naval battles themselves, vastly more, to bring that war to a conclusion. As my friend from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] suggests, we might as well give up the militia. You must have men; and in order to have them you must take care that they receive sufficient encouragement not to abandon that business which is the only opportunity you have to furnish yourself on this continent with a corps of men who can perform that essential service—that service without which we should be subjected, on the first outbreak of any difficulty with a great naval Power, to have our commerce swept from the ocean without the possible power of retaliation, and be at the mercy of our enemy.

Now, it only remains for the Senate to say whether they are disposed, for this small amount, to strike at a system which has been sustained so long; a policy which was adopted so early, and has been continued with the approbation of the country from the very beginning of the Government down to the present time. Great men, able men, have made attacks, serious and strong attacks, on this policy; but it has stood strongly intrenched in the judgment of the people of the country down to the present time, for the reason that experience had proved its value, and experienced men had given the weight of their authority to it. I hope, sir, we shall not now reverse a policy so long established and so well approved.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from Alabama propose to take a vote on this bill to-day?

Mr. CLAY. I hope so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no particular interest in this matter, as I perceive by the figures which have been presented by the Senator from Alabama that the State of Rhode Island has but one fishing vessel, and I do not suppose that my constituents will suffer much if the bounties be repealed, according to the Senator's notion; but, sir, I believe that these fishing bounties are just as much to the interest of my State as if the fishermen lived there. I do not hold that, because the location of these fishermen happens to be in Maine and Massachusetts, the other States of the Union have, therefore, no interest in keeping up this employment. I believe that the Senator from Alabama, by the very tables he has introduced, has given a better argument in favor of continuing those bounties than I could give if I were to undertake an investigation of the subject with a view to support the bounties. He has said that other maritime nations not only gave bounties to the cod fisheries, but also to the mackerel and to the whale fisheries; but that notwithstanding France and England and Holland have given these bounties to the whale fisheries, our whale fishermen have outstripped them all. Now, sir, I believe that the success of this country in the whale fisheries is entirely due to that very nursery of seamen which those bounties have furnished. Look at the location of the whale fishery in this country, and you will see that it takes its root in the mackerel and cod fisheries. It is not successfully carried on from any other portion of this country, unless that surrounded by the cod fisheries. It has never succeeded in Rhode Island, for the reason that we could never cultivate the cod fishery; because we do not live near enough to the fishing grounds, or for some other reason. We have tried whale fishing, and only in a very few instances could we make it succeed. Look to New Bedford, as the Senator from Maine has stated—the richest town in the United States, with more whale tonnage than all the rest of our towns put together. Why is it so? Because it is the center of the cod fishermen, and the whale ships are recruited from men who have been engaged in these little fishing vessels.

The Senator says the whale fishery flourishes. It does flourish; it has the kind of men to make it flourish. I once before asked, when this matter was up in the Senate, whether any Senator believed that south of Mason & Dixon's line they could man a ship that would catch a whale. No, sir; they can never raise the men for it where there is good soil and profitable employment; but you can get the men at such places as Marblehead, where you cannot raise potatoes. You might as well live on a flat rock. They must fish or starve, and that is the reason they fish. There is a kind of saying there that a man must fish, cut bait, or starve; and that is the reason these men are trained in this service. There is no other way to get a living there, and that is how the proverb arose.

I wish to ask the Senator's attention to the cost of nurturing these seamen. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] the other day, showed what they were worth in the last war. Now, let us see what they cost. The Senator from New Hampshire, I believe, has submitted an amendment to this bill, to abolish the Naval School and the Military Academy. I am against the bill and against the amendment, but I think they are intimately connected. If you want a naval school to make officers it seems to me you want a fishing school to make seamen; and the cost of the two is about in proportion as their pay—not exactly in the proportion of their pecuniary pay—but in proportion as the glory is to these classes of men. The Senator from Alabama tells us that during the existence of this Government we have paid $12,000,000 for fishing bounties, and that there are about fifteen thousand people annually employed in them. We have been sixty-nine years in existence, and if we educate fifteen thousand seamen a year in the fisheries, the whole number is one million thirty-five thousand; and the cost of their education is about twelve dollars a piece.

Mr. CLAY. The average number employed in the fisheries does not reach ten thousand. The average for the last decade has been thirteen thousand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I took the Senator's tables as he presented them, and am not going to cipher very closely. If it took four years to educate a sailor, as it does to educate a soldier, the cost would be forty-eight dollars. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Finance that it cost $3,200 to educate an officer at your Naval School—$800 a year for four years. Thus the proportion is forty-eight dollars for the sailor to $3,200 for the naval officer, and that is about in inverse proportion to the work they do. The sailors do all the fighting and the others get all the glory. You might as well abolish your Naval School for officers at once if you undertake to repeal these bounties and destroy the nursery of the sailors.

I am not going into the question of whether this was a drawback originally or not. I have no doubt that memorials may be found in favor of drawbacks and in favor of bounties, presented with the arguments of an ingenious lawyer for one or the other, but that has nothing to do with the question of nurturing sailors. Those who sent in the memorials wanted to get the bounty. There was some obstacle thrown in the way by the Treasury circulars, and they endeavored to get the bounty, and presented whatever argument was designed to accomplish that end. The Senator reads that as an argument against the system. It is a mere memorial drawn up by some sensible man, I agree, because it was drawn up to get the bounty, and they generally accomplished it.

The Senator from Alabama has told us of frauds in consequence of those vessels catching mackerel, when they took a license for a cod-fishing voyage. I remember the circumstance alluded to by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] as to the vessels taken in Newport. Whenever there is a storm, these vessels are in the habit of making Newport, which is the best harbor on that coast, and they come in there in droves. I have seen two hundred fishing vessels come in in a storm. On the occasion alluded to by the Senator from Maine, these political men in the custom-house, under directions from the Treasury, got the notion that if a vessel with a cod fish license caught mackerel, the license was forfeited. About half the newspaper articles presented here, and quoted in the speech of the Senator from Alabama, about the cod fishermen, were made up, I will not pretend to say by men who held office, but I will say that they are arguments made either to get office or to satisfy the party after they have got it. They do not care anything about the fishermen or the fishing bounties. The officers in Rhode Island, as I said, got the notion that a fishing vessel was forfeited if she had on board any gear to catch mackerel with. Two or three hundred came into Newport out of a storm, and the officers seized them. There was a long trial, and finally the officers were beaten, and they had about as hard a trial to get their fees at the Treasury as they had with the fishermen; and I think the Treasury ought never to have paid them, because it was mere pirating on the poor fellows, who came into the harbor to get rid of the storm.

Sir, these fishing bounties are well spent. If we cannot afford to pay twelve dollars a year, for four years, to teach a sailor, and make him a good seaman, one that can be relied upon in time of war, we had better give up our Naval School, and stop paying $3,200 to educate a naval officer. I believe that money to be well spent, and, in my judgment, the time is not far distant when we shall want all the officers and all the sailors to support the rights of this country. We are going off on the wrong track. This notion of setting the mackerel fishermen and the whale fishermen against the cod fishermen, because they do not all get bounties, is the very system which is undermining the whole labor of this country. It is easy enough to set one class of hard working men against another, and tell them "the Government does not protect you but protects another; let us get rid of what protection the fishermen have," and that is the object of the newspaper paragraphs that have been introduced. If there were three shoemakers here, I could get the voice of all others to undermine their business, because I could say, "we go for the greatest good to the greatest number; all of us buy shoes and there are very few who make them." These fishing craft have diminished in proportion to the rest of our commerce, as the Senator says. That is proof positive that the bounty is not very great and the business not very profitable. The increase in all other departments of industry has been fourfold to what it has been in this, which has received a bounty. The Senator has made out that fact in his speech. If this fishing business is a profitable one, I want to know why there are not more in it; why do not people invest their money in it and make the great profits of which the Senator told us? There are no such profits in any business as the Senator estimated in this—some twenty or thirty per cent. a year. Why, sir, it would ruin the world if any important branch of business paid thirty per cent. People cannot make money enough to allow thirty per cent. on any considerable branch of business. I have had a little experience in casting interest, and I will give an illustration.

When I was a boy I happened to spend thirty-five dollars to get me a suit of training clothes as I should call them now, but they were called military clothes then. When I got to be sixteen years old I was very patriotic. I lived in Newport, and it was considered to be a very hazardous place in case of a war. It was a good harbor; it had been taken in the time of the Revolution; and it was thought it would be taken if we had a war with Great Britain. My schoolmaster was a major in this military company and we had an ex-Senator who invited me to spend what little pocket money I had, to be a soldier. I went in at sixteen, but I do not suppose I could get a land warrant to save my life. [Laughter.] I spent thirty-five dollars on the clothes, and I have cast the interest on it since I have been here, to see how much those thirty-five dollars, at the current rates of interest, the two and a half per cent. to which I alluded last December, would amount in 1861, about the time Mr. Buchanan is going out of power, supposing that money might be very valuable then. I believe there is not a man in the Senate now who would believe me if he did not know that I would not cast it improperly; but if I had had that thirty-five dollars at thirty per cent. per annum, accumulating until this day, this Government could not pay the interest on it with all the taxes they could levy. The annual interest at thirty per cent. would amount to more than the national debt of England does to-day; and they require $200,000,000 to pay their interest, and they reel under it. It is more than three hundred and thirty million dollars. Three hundred and thirty million dollars at thirty per cent. is more than the annual interest on the national debt of England, and it takes more than two hundred million dollars to pay that, and if they did not owe it to their own people they would be bankrupt. You cannot pay thirty per cent. profit on any business. If these fishermen get six per cent. on the capital, and twelve dollars a month wages, I venture to say it is all they realize. You cannot hire a man to stay on shore for twelve dollars a month. One hundred and fifty dollars a year is, as the Senator from Maine says, about all these men get for catching fish nine months in the year, and staying on a bleak place on the New England coast for three. They ought to have three months to recruit, to enable them to stand the fog and the storm. We pay $300,000 a year to these fishermen, and educate fifteen thousand men for that sum. We pay much more than that every year to educate six hundred officers, and nobody thinks anything of it.

Mr. HALE. I do.
Mr. SIMMONS. Sir, the Senator from New Hampshire does not like it, but I am in favor of it. I want to have good officers and good men, and I am willing to pay for them. I believe, now, that if these men played instead of worked, there would be no objection to their having this money. This fishing service is the hardest in the world, and I believe we ought to have more of it, but I do not know how to get it. I do not like the reflection that if we should happen to have a war with a maritime Power, every sail we have got to float on the ocean must take shelter in a harbor, as it did before, or be captured. We are too big a nation to retreat at the first sound of a cannon, and draw all our ships into port as we did in 1812. I want the commerce of this country to be carried on as the commerce of other countries is, if there is a war.

These fishermen are the very men to use in case of war, for naval purposes; and let your whalemen and your merchantmen pursue their avocations. Take these sixty thousand fishermen, men of the right stamp, have vessels enough for them, and have your sails afloat upon every ocean although England or France be your antagonist. Then we shall occupy such a place as a nation of thirty millions of people is entitled to enjoy in the world; but if you have got to destroy all your commerce, if that is the cost of maintaining your national honor, your people will all oppose sustaining your flag or your honor at such an enormous sacrifice of the whole business and the whole property invested in commerce. You must have a Navy, or else submit to every taunt and insult you may receive in your diplomatic intercourse with foreign nations. This is the very best place to nurture the kind of men that are necessary to sustain the honor of the flag and the honor of the nation, not only while you are at war, but when you are at peace.

I should like to have the Government of the United States feel that, if there is a little speck in the distance, a cloud arising, they must not take in sail before the wind strikes them, but pursue the even tenor of their way, as if they were a match for any people in the world; negotiate fairly, and try to preserve peace; but preserve peace not by degrading submission produced by the fact that we have such a vast amount of property exposed afloat. We have now as large a merchant tonnage, I suppose, as any nation in the world. I have not seen the accounts lately; but I have no doubt it is equal to the merchant tonnage of any other nation. And what have we got to defend it? Literally nothing. There comes up a little difficulty about the finances, and we are to let all we have got rot before we sustain it. I acknowledge that this is a good time to make savings in the Treasury; and I will go for cutting down salaries, or dispensing with the services of men who do not earn a dollar a day where we give them six. But as to the twelve dollars a year we pay for fishermen, and obtain by it fifteen thousand seamen, I verily believe it would be the most unfortunate species of economy that could possibly be resorted to. I have no particular interest in it that ought not to be felt in every section of this country. We could not have any fishery carried on in the southern States; and if we could, it would not give the kind of education that is necessary.

What was the object of all these laws? The Senator began by quoting Mr. Ames's remark that the catching of cod was a most momentous concern. I did not understand it exactly as a sneer, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. Hamlin] did; I thought there was a little conflict in his emotions. He hardly knew whether to venerate it or ridicule it; but the argument that followed sustained it; and, when you look at the whale fishery as the result of this school, there is no such monument of the wisdom of such a provision to be found in the civilized world.

I think the success of the Americans concerned in the whale fisheries is the proudest monument we have. I have seen the instruments that the French have invented to catch whales. They have a cannon fixed with a groove in it, and they shoot the harpoons at the whales, so as to keep them at a respectable distance. But take a crew of Americans brought up in the cod fisheries, and they row right up to the whale, get alongside of him, and they have no concern as to what will become of the boat if they can only get the grappling-iron in. I should like to know if you would expect men to do that who were brought up on Turkey carpets. No, sir; if you want to make hardy men, you must raise them in the ordinary pursuits of life. You do not want them to undergo torture, but you must make a pursuit for them in which they can make a living; grow hardy as they grow up; and this is the very pursuit to make sailors. I would not risk my neck in one of those fishing vessels for all the bounties you give; I would rather take my chance in raising potatoes on solid land. I have been to sea two or three times, and there is too much trouble in it for my use; but I am willing to pay others if they will take the hazard.

I hope the Senator from Alabama will let this matter go over until he can sleep a night and think on the other side of this question. I do not believe he is yet ready to take the vote.

Mr. CLAY. Yes, I am.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt he can make a good argument on either side; but I believe the time has come when no man in this country will get fame by assailing the labor of any pursuit. Although these fishermen live in regions where he may not like the votes, I hope he will have some consideration for them. The same feeling that prompts me to sustain these fishermen is now working in the heart of every man in this country who ever earned a dollar in his life. It is time this Government would turn its attention, not to plundering these people, or driving them out of their pursuit, but to bettering their condition; and if these fishermen do not increase, as they do not, according to the Senator's speech, we had better do something more for them, instead of taking away what we have done, for we need more of them instead of less.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Mason in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce, to fill the blank in the bill by inserting "the last of 1859."

Mr. ALLEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "the last," and inserting "the 31st day of December;" and I also propose an additional section to the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection to the amendment. It means the same thing.

Mr. ALLEN. But it makes it a little plainer. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I inquire of the Chair whether the question is not first on the amendment proposed by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on that amendment as now modified.

Mr. CLAY. I trust that will prevail.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the amendment as modified?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the committee was modified by the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, and the amendment as modified will be read.

Mr. PUGH. I understood the Senator from Rhode Island to offer an additional section which has not yet been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not yet in order, and has not been received.

The Secretary read the amendment of the committee, as modified.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is an amendment which provides for the time when this bill is to take effect. That includes one additional year. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "1859" and inserting "1865." My amendment is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CLAY. I trust that amendment will not prevail. The act of 1807, repealing the salt duty and the fishing allowance, was passed on the 3d of March, 1807, and that provided for the repeal of the salt duty, and all the allowance or bounties on tonnage or the exported fish, from and after the 1st day of January next, allowing but nine months before the repeal of the bounties. By this bill we give nearly two years of time. We allow them the bounties for this year and the bounties for next year. Certainly that is a sufficient advertisement of the repeal of the bounties to enable them to turn their attention to some other pursuit, if the cod fishery cannot live, as is alleged, without the aid of bounty.

Now, sir, if I am correctly informed, and I do not speak about things that I know nothing of, at least without the warrant of some testimony, these men are not exclusively employed in the cod fisheries. I understand Senators on the other side to concede this. They say that they engage in other fisheries during nine months in the year. They also engage in the coasting trade, if I am correctly informed, or they are engaged in some agricultural pursuit at home. This is not their sole or their exclusive business. It forms, indeed, if I am correctly informed, but a small part of their business.

Now, sir, if we may assume, which I do not grant, however, at all, that the repeal of these bounties will break down the cod fisheries, and will drive men out of that business, notwithstanding the mackerel fishery is pursued, and has been pursued for over thirty years, without the help of any bounty—if we concede that these men must abandon the catching of cod in case this bounty be repealed, yet, I say, there are other pursuits, both on sea and on land, to which they can turn their attention, and devote their energies, and it is sufficient time to give them until the close of next year. They have been advertised now for more than twelve months, that an effort would be made to repeal the bounties. The newspaper press of New England have anticipated their repeal, and predicted that they would be repealed whenever the question was presented to Congress. Hence they are not taken by surprise. They will not be cut down suddenly. They will have ample time in order to direct their attention to other channels of trade that are more lucrative, if they cannot live by this.

The proposition of the Senator from Maine is tantamount to a defeat of the purpose of this bill. He proposes to give them seven years more, including this year. In the intermediate time he hopes, no doubt, that he may command a sufficient vote in Congress to continue the bounties indefinitely as they have been continued hitherto. Now, sir, the whole course of legislation upon the subject of these bounties is an argument against the extension of time beyond that proposed by the committee. Every act, as I showed in the speech I had the honor of making the other day, up to that of 1819, contemplated a continuance of these allowances but for short periods of time; the first act for but two or three years; the next for seven years; the next for ten years; and yet that was repealed within seven years after it was passed—I allude to the act of 1800. The next, the act of 1813, provided for their allowance during the war and but one year thereafter. When a proposal was made for their repeal in 1816, at which time the allowance would have expired by limitation of time, they were continued expressly on the ground that the Government needed the salt duty; that the Government could not do without the salt duty; that we had incurred a heavy debt, contracted during the war; that that duty afforded some eight hundred thousand dollars per annum of revenue after the allowance to the fishing vessels, which, at that time in lieu of drawback was very inconsiderable; that the commerce in cod fish more than reimbursed the Treasury for the amount paid out in the way of drawback or commutation in lieu of drawback. Upon these grounds expressly, upon revenue grounds, this bounty was continued up to 1818. In 1818, when an effort was again made to repeal them, the same arguments were repeated; and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and the then Secretary of the Treasury both declared that they could not dispense, in the then existing condition of the country, with the salt duty, which yielded at that time upwards of seven hundred thousand dollars. Thus it has been under the pretenses of a short duration of the continuance of these bounties, that they have been protracted from 1792, when the tonnage system was first adopted, up to 1819. If the Senator's amendment prevails, I say it is tantamount to defeating the bill; for I shall feel very little interest in the passage of the bill if they are to have these bounties extended for seven years more, with all the chances, in the intermediate time, of the repeal of this act.

Mr. HAMLIN. I cannot understand the force of the Senator's argument when he says, that if the amendment I have proposed be adopted, it will be equivalent to a defeat of the bill. I do not think the amendment which I propose is entitled to any such objection. I do not think the Senator's suggestion is founded in any good reason; certainly he has stated none.

Now, sir, in relation to the character of these fishermen. Whatever may be the sources from which the Senator has derived his information, I assure him they are mistaken when they represent that the persons engaged in this business do not mainly rely upon this branch of industry for the support of themselves and their families. More than nine-tenths of their reliance is upon it. They fish for nine months in the year, and the other months are an inclement season, when they cannot devote their labors to agriculture, nor, to any extent, to coasting; though they do busy themselves somewhat in other matters. This, however, is the great business upon which they rely. There is no stable business followed by any class of men upon which they rely more than these men rely upon the business which they follow.

Next as to the time. The persons engaged in this business have been induced to go into it through the system of bounty, right or wrong. The vessels, as every man who has any practical knowledge knows, are unfit for coasting or any other business. These vessels will last for fifteen or twenty years. They are in the business to-day, and I insist that if you are going to repeal the law it is not an extraordinary time; it is not an equation, for that would amount to some nine or ten years; it is not an unnecessary time to give these people some opportunity to protect themselves against the blow which is to come upon them. Whatever may be the sense of the Senate in relation to repealing these bounties, I think that six or seven years after this is not a period of time which ought to be objectionable to any Senator. I think strict justice to these men who have gone into this business ought to lead every Senator to vote for the time I have proposed. I think ten years would be no more than just; certainly six years is a limited period of time, and I do hope that it is a time that will commend itself to the judgment and approval of the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish only to say a word in explanation of the vote I shall give on this subject. This allowance to the fishermen, by whatever name it may be called, whether drawback or bounty, has been one of the ancient policies of this Government. On former occasions, I voted against a proposition like that now made for its repeal, and it was voted against generally, I believe, by the party with which I was associated. Mr. Clay used to oppose this bill. I confess that I have never made any very accurate examination myself of this subject; but when I first came into public life, I found it, as I supposed, part of the established policy of the country. I have adhered to it in the confidence that what was done by those who had gone before us, and which had continued so long undisturbed by their posterity, had some good foundation on which to rest; and my own experience and observation have tended to corroborate this opinion. I have supposed that many of the seamen with whom, to the astonishment of the world, we have gained so many victories on the high seas, had been contributed mainly by these fisheries, to the accomplishment of that great national object, and that great national glory which has been so highly cherished, and it is in that point of view particularly that I have regarded it as a nursery for seamen; and why is not that worthy of the national attention and the national protection?

Sir, to prepare men to command as officers in your Navy you are at great expense. You have your Naval School at Annapolis; and you educate a certain number of the young men of the country for the purpose of serving on board your ships. What would those officers, what would the fine ships accomplish without this necessary and essential portion which constitutes their force? You must have seamen, or your officers and your ships will have been created in vain. They can do nothing without men. I think we are compensated by the excellence of this system. You have now a bill before you which has received the sanction of the House of Representatives to appropriate large amounts of the public domain to educate men as farmers, to make it a science: why should you not, then, have, and attend to, your nurseries for seamen? We must have a navy. Our rank and position in the world, our commerce in the world demand it. We must have seamen to man it; and, if possible, seamen of our own—American seamen—not merely bound by the terms of their enlistment, but bound by every instinct and every impulse of the heart to fight for the country that gave them birth, and has sustained them and given them place. These are the sort of men, as has been well said, to whom I should like to see the banner of my country always confided. They have repaid us, and more than repaid us, in their achievements on the seas for all they have cost us. It is but an encouragement to help them to follow this course of life. My friend from Alabama supposes it does not make them seamen fit to go at once into a man-of-war; it gives them no acquaintance with ships of that size and construction! Be it so; but we shall all agree, I know, that it acquaints them with the mighty ocean; and that is one of the great elements of a seaman's character. It does not seem to me to be a matter of so much consequence in what size or sort of vessel he challenges the storms of the ocean: it makes him acquainted with the sea, with its hardships and its storms, and the necessity of guiding and preserving the vessel which preserves him. And when we can do it so cheaply; when we can educate in this nursery so cheaply a body of seamen, it seems to me that we are but following out the policy of our military institutions, and our naval institutions at West Point and at Annapolis.

These are the very obvious views upon which I shall act, as I have acted before, in voting against taking away from these men this bounty. I have supposed it was but small in amount; but it seems to have effected its purpose, and that fact appears to me to be one altogether favorable to our national institutions and national objects. Until I am convinced to the contrary, I shall hereafter do as I do now—vote against repealing these bounties.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, after the very elaborate and able speech of the Senator from Alabama, who introduced this bill, it is unnecessary to go into detail in the discussion of it, and that is not my purpose; but I wish to express my hearty concurrence in the bill which he reported from the Committee on Commerce. None of the arguments, none of the principles on which he placed the policy of the bill, have been attempted to be attacked. We hear a great deal—it is the occasion for a good deal of patriotic declamation—about the services of our seamen, which were very highly creditable; and I have no doubt they will continue to be so whenever their services are necessary. I do not believe you increase their number and efficiency by bounties; I do not think that is one of the ways to build up the country in any department, in any of its industry, for any purpose.

My friend from Kentucky has alluded to your establishments for naval and military education. I believe that the Government does any business of this kind worse than an individual. Such has been the experience of the whole world in all ages and all countries, and will be here. What did a Government ever do well? Why, sir, you may tax your imagination, or look to the facts and to history, and in all ages it has done nothing of that kind well, and cannot do it. It cannot have a good school; anybody can beat it. You may take the Military Academy you have now, and any enterprising American citizen would educate the boys there twice as well for a tenth of the money. Take your Naval School, and any enterprising man in America would educate them twice as well for a tenth of the money. The time will come when they will fall too. These are nothing but old abuses.

When this bounty system was started, it was a free-trade measure, it was a just measure, and I would agree to that to-day. It has been the policy of the country to increase its commerce by taking off burdens. When you import a raw material, manufacture, and export it, it has been the policy to give a drawback on the amount of the duty on the raw material which entered into the manufacture. That is done to facilitate commerce. These fishermen imported salt, used it in curing their fish, and then exported the fish. It was a burden on them to charge them the duty on salt. It came within the general law of the land which now exists, and which all Governments have adopted, not to put burdens on the industry of a country, not to tax articles that are re-exported. We adopted that policy here. We remitted the duty on the salt to the fishermen when they exported the fish, and afterwards we commuted it. It was commuted for a fixed bounty. This was secured through adroit management. The price and the duty had fluctuated. They would always fluctuate under our present ad valorem system. Then the duty was sometimes ad valorem and sometimes specific. To make the allowance certain, and to prevent change by the change of laws, an estimate was made which has been fully explained by the Senator from Alabama, and the value of the drawback was given in the shape of allowance on tonnage. It was a commutation.

I say this was under no idea of a nursery for seamen. That was occasionally alluded to arguendo; but the principle even of the Massachusetts men, as already shown, of the men who defended the bounty, was, that it stood on precisely the footing of a drawback on imported goods which were re-exported, and which it has been the policy of the Government to allow ever since 1789. It is so in regard to sugar. You may bring it into the country, refine it, and take it out, and then the duty on the importation is remitted. This is a wise policy to increase the business of the country. It is a wrong idea to suppose that Congress agreed to give so much a ton to pay for catching cod fish. To be sure it did not extend to the whale fishery, or to the mackerel fishery, but it was confined to the cod fishery, because it was in that business that they used so much salt, and exported the fish when cured with salt. As the tables show, it was at that time a very large portion of our commerce, and it was wise in the Government to encourage it, not by bounties, but by taking off burdens. If the Government lays a heavy hand on them, if it does them any act of injustice, there is no class of my fellow-citizens I would relieve sooner. I think they are worthy, deserving, and needy; and all these would be reasons why we ought, at all times, and on all occasions, to be vigorous in the exertion of their rights, and doing them extreme justice. I am willing to do it now. The duty on salt has been taken off, or has become only nominal, (about two and a half cents, I believe,) and the fishermen may have that if they choose. When the act in regard to fishing bounties was passed, the duty on salt was twenty cents a bushel; now I believe it is two and a half cents. If the fishermen want a drawback of two and a half cents on their salt, let them have it.

The idea that you will get more seamen by bounties, or that you will invigorate the fishing business by bounties, is against the experience of all nations. A permanent bounty has been ascertained, by the experience of the world, to be injurious to all business, and, therefore, all the enlightened nations of the earth are gradually taking away bounties, taking away prohibition, giving a free vent to all employments, and free competition, at least, at home. The world has been benefited by this to a most extraordinary degree in the last fifty years.

This is a small thing, it is true; but if this policy is wrong, or the circumstances are changed, so that it is no longer desirable, the bounty should be taken off; but in doing it, we ought to protect the interests engaged in it, by giving them a reasonable time for changing their pursuits, and getting rid of this property. I do not know how long these vessels last. I suppose four or five or six years.

Mr. HAMLIN. They last fifteen years.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is impossible.

Mr. HAMLIN. No; it is true.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, I know very little about it; I am no sailor; I live away from the sea, and I have had but very little to do with it, and I hope to have less, because I do not like it. I do not think, however, from the history of our commercial marine, that ships last that long. They are not all new, and therefore I should say that a very much less time than is asked, seven years, would be quite ample. The Senator from Rhode Island told me six or seven years. He lives close to the sea, and was a soldier besides, so he ought to know something about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not pretend to have any experience, but I said I thought it would be better to take five years than nothing. I wanted a chance.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was merely asking the Senator from Rhode Island for information, and I understood him to say one of these vessels lasted five or six years. The Senator from Rhode Island stands inveterately on the principle of bounties, prohibitions, and protections. I do not. I think it is bad policy. I think it is bad for the fishermen, bad for the business of catching fish. You will have more fish and have more fishermen, if you take off the bounties. That has been the result of similar proceedings in all enlightened modern nations in other business, and I think it will be so in catching fish.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says I stand inveterately on the principle of protection. I defined my position on that subject as long ago as a quarter of a century back. I went in for a gradual reduction of duties to twenty per cent. I believe my people were all against me on that; but I thought that good policy. When I came here in 1842, I wanted about twenty-five per cent. as the rate of duty, and the hardest men I had to get along with were my friends from Georgia. They wanted a higher protection than I thought was necessary.

Mr. TOOMBS. Not a man of them voted for it. I will do that justice to those who were here then. That act did not get a single vote from the State of Georgia in either House.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that; but when I wanted to modify that act I found trouble with my Georgia friends. I wanted to reduce the act of 1842, in lieu of passing the act of 1846, and I could never get one of them to consent to any reduction. They said the act of 1842 was the best in the world, and everybody was growing up under it. But I have not said one word this winter about the rates of duty. I have come down now to the ground that if you will stop cheating, I will be content with any rate of duty you will give us. That is my ground. Is that high protection? I think everybody is entitled to protection against being cheated, if the Government can give it, and I think I shall have the aid of my distinguished friend in giving it.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is likely you will.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that we shall be together, I am no stickler about this matter. I have no acquaintance with this fishing business. I suggested that I was willing to vote for five years instead of seven, if it could get general assent. I believe we had better have anything that will be pretty tolerably harmonious, than to fight for two or three years about time; and if the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Maine are willing, I should be glad to compromise upon five years.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would like to try seven.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will vote for the longest time. I want to give them a fair chance.

Now, let me make one suggestion to the Senator from Georgia. Some of the vessels are old ones. If the bounties be taken off, in my opinion there will be no new vessels built, and there will be less left; they are wearing out, so that that is one motive for fixing seven years; and as fast as an old vessel wears out, they will not build a new one to take her place, with no prospect of bounty, and towards the end of the time you will have very few. The idea that the experience of the world has shown that these bounties are injudicious to business, is a novel one to me. I believe England, and Holland, and France are about as old nations as there are now who have ever had any commercial credit, in modern times, at any rate, and they—

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that they have proven that they agree with the Senator from Georgia in denouncing these bounties as inexpedient and unwise in policy by abandoning them. They have abandoned their bounties.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, in his speech, said that there was no wisdom in these bounties, because our whale fisheries had outstripped the English and French, though they continued to give bounties. I do not know whether he was right or wrong, but I took it from that.

Mr. CLAY. I am right, and I shall adduce in conclusion—

Mr. SIMMONS. Did not the Senator talk about the English giving bounties?

Mr. CLAY. They did so, but have repealed them.

Mr. SIMMONS. When?

Mr. CLAY. In 1830, on the herring and whale fisheries.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do they give cod-fish bounties yet?

Mr. CLAY. No, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then how comes it that the Senator used that as an argument to prove that these bounties were deleterious? He says we outstrip them in the whale fishery notwithstanding they give bounties.

Mr. CLAY. I stated that they had originated the system of bounties. It was transplanted from Europe to this country. They originated the system and pursued it for two hundred years in regard to the herring fishery. I shall be prepared to show, if I am ever permitted to conclude the debate, by the testimony of English writers as well as New Englanders, that the fisheries languished under their bounty system, although they gave far greater bounties than we have ever given, or proposed to give, and finally they repealed their bounties. From 1789, and, indeed, further back—for our whale fisheries date a long way back of that—throughout the period of our contest with them in the whale fishery from the time we commenced whale fishing up to 1830, we beat them, although they gave bounties and we gave none. They gave enormous bounties sometimes. I will show that a New England writer, of great celebrity, boasted of our triumph over them, unaided by the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. The tenor of the Senator's argument would lead anybody to suppose that our vessels, without bounties, had been successful against a nation that gave bounties. That is what he said. I am not going to continue this debate, I hope the Senator from Maine, if he does not carry his amendment for seven years, will agree to five. I think he had better compound for five years now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to say a word in relation to this amendment of the Senator from Maine. The appeal is made to our sense of justice if this bill should pass, to retain these bounties for some six or seven years longer, upon the statement that parties have gone into the business, induced to embark in it by reason of the legislation of Congress, and that their business would be broken up in the event of a sudden repeal of these bounties. I admit the propriety of the appeal to the extent of allowing these parties fair time to embark in other business; but there is nothing whatever in the appeal, so far as it is addressed to a claim on the equity of the Government, because they have embarked in a business upon the faith of the bounty. Why, sir, upon a principle like that, you never could change your tariff laws. Every time there has been a change in the tariff laws the same argument has always been made. We have established our manufactures on the faith of a certain rate of protection, of duty, and now it would be unfair to break us up by lowering the duty. The answer to that has always been, you know, that the same power which created this bounty had it in its power, at any moment, to repeal it, and it was a part of the risk of the business which you assumed when you chose to buy vessels and embark in this fishing business. You did it, on the one hand, with a view to the bounties of the legislation then existing; but if you were prudent men, as you were all supposed to be, you also had in contemplation the possibility of the repeal; and taking the bounty on the one hand, and the risk of repeal on the other, you based your business operations on those two elements in your calculation.

Now, sir, I see no justice or propriety in this argument that the bounties are to be continued, if they are injudicious and impolitic, for some six or seven years, until the vessels wear out; but that a reasonable time should be allowed to any class of our citizens who may desire to abandon this business to seek other employment for their vessels, I admit to be a reasonable appeal. We had this matter discussed in committee; and I do not think the Senator from Maine asked any such length of time.

Mr. HAMLIN. I made a motion for ten years, and you voted me down.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I dare say the Senator is right; I yield at once to his recollection of the facts; but we discussed the matter in committee. Some gentlemen were for immediate repeal; some for repeal at the end of the present year, and we finally agreed that if the present season was worked out and another full season given, that would be ample and reasonable time for the repeal, if the repeal was to take place.

I will say a word more, as I am up, on the general subject. I have listened with great attention to the arguments in favor of retaining this bounty. They have been able and ingenious, and if I believed that these fisheries could not be maintained without the bounty, I never would give a vote for the repeal; but I do not think any line of argument could induce me to come to that conclusion. I have some very thorough convictions on the subject. I believe that, according to all the maxims of political economy, these matters regulate themselves. If cod fish to a certain amount is required for the supply of the world, and if the Government pays a bounty, purchasers get it that much cheaper. If the Government withholds that bounty, those who buy the fish pay the additional price, for those who catch the fish must live by the business or it will be abandoned. I believe that to be true in general as regards business, all over the world.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia that you cannot build up any business by bounties, because if the business is a profitable one, many persons go into it, and competition reduces it to a general level; and if the business is an unprofitable one, bounties will not keep it up, for no such bounties as you pay could begin to keep up a business that was unprofitable. It merely acts on the price of the commodity brought into market. Take the case of these bounties as the gentlemen themselves show them to be. They state that there are about two thousand fishing vessels—some say three thousand. According to my calculation, they receive from one to two hundred dollars apiece from the Government. The large ones receive more, and the smaller ones less; but the average pay now given by the Government is about three hundred thousand dollars; therefore, from one to two hundred dollars apiece to two thousand or three thousand vessels is the amount of the bounty. If the fishermen cannot live without that addition to what they are now receiving, what will be the result? That they must charge the additional price on the fish or stop catching fish. If the supply of fish diminishes, the price rises, and that rise of price compensates for the diminished supply. The matter will regulate itself according to the well-known principles of political economy. Either cod fish will be abandoned as an article of human consumption, or those who catch the fish will receive a living price for catching it, and all your legislation cannot change that fact. Under these circumstances, and believing it to be entirely contrary to the true principles of government, I cannot vote for the continuance of this bounty.

Mr. COLLAMER. The people whom I represent have no interest in this matter at all, more than the constituents of the Senator from Louisiana, but I will suggest to him one consideration in response to the suggestion he has made. In my opinion there will be as many fish caught without these bounties as with them; and at a reasonable and fair rate of price, the demand of the world will be supplied; but it should be remembered that we have a reciprocity treaty by which the fish caught by fishermen of the British Provinces pass into this country without duty. The Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Labrador fisheries can be altogether better and easier pursued by fishermen there than from this country, and when this bounty is taken off, inasmuch as the fishermen of those Provinces can bring fish into our market without duty, the advantage of their locality is such that the effect will be that the fisheries will pass into the hands of the inhabitants of the British Provinces and will produce seamen for the British Navy instead of American seamen for the American Navy. That will be the effect.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not know that I violate the secrecy of executive session when I say that it was with a view to just such consequences as these that I voted against the reciprocity treaty. Now, what is the argument? The reciprocity treaty was made, the result of which was exclusively for the benefit of our northern brethren, because there is no reciprocal commerce between Canada and the South. By that treaty we agreed that if England would let our produce into Canada and the other British Provinces without any duty on their part, they might send the products of those Provinces into our country without duty. Their fish now come in free of duty. This Government has abandoned all revenue arising from the Canada trade with the northern frontier; and because it has abandoned that revenue the proposition now is, if the Senator from Vermont be correct in his argument, that after having done that, the remainder of the Union shall make up a protection for the fishermen to compensate for the abandonment of the duty on imported fish by contributing a bounty to them to enable them to compete with those who are enabled to fish nearer to the banks by reason of the proximity of their harbors. The result is that we pay both sides. The remainder of the country is to pay both sides. The whole burden of the reciprocity treaty, then, is to be thrown on that part of the country which does not catch the fish. It is to pay protection to those who do, after abandoning the revenues which the nation derived from the impost upon British goods coming in across the Canadian frontier.

Sir, every step that you make in a policy of this character shows more and more glaringly its inequality in its operation on the different parts of the Union. I do not think it is a fair system, and I do not think the Senator from Vermont helps it much by his explanation. It may undoubtedly be true, as he says, that the provincials have an advantage over our fishermen, but why the rest of the Union is now to pay a contribution in order to put them back on an equality, after having abandoned all chance of putting them on the same equality by the usual revenue policy of the Government, I do not understand, and I cannot see the justice of the appeal.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am fortunately so situated that I am not in any danger of betraying any secrets of executive session on the subject of that treaty. I can merely say that the State which I represent was opposed to that treaty; and I believe her Senators voted against it. No such inducement as the Senator from Louisiana intimates governed that people at all. If it be true that the people of Maine and Massachusetts were induced to go into, and did go into, the support of that treaty from any purpose like that which the Senator's remarks suggest, I am sure it must have been a very short-sighted policy.

Mr. HAMLIN. I believe I have a right to state that I did not vote for that treaty, and was opposed to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not vote for it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The people whom I in part represent seem to be, somehow or other, shuffled out of sight in arrangements between North and South; and I cannot find out who did it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did it in part.

Mr. COLLAMER. I fancy that when we really come to examine the motives which led to that treaty, we shall not be able to charge them so exclusively upon one quarter as the Senator from Louisiana seems to suggest. I have been strongly impressed with the idea that that treaty was made for the purpose of persuading Canada not to join the United States, lest it might alter the balance of political power between North and South. I think that was really at the bottom of the matter; because, if they could have all the advantages of trade with this country, and through it, without contributing anything to the support of our Government, they would not be very likely to be as anxious to join us as they had been for several years before; and they were quieted in that manner. They now derive all the advantages of receiving their importations through this country duty free, without contributing anything to the support of our Government. Under such an arrangement they will probably be very quiet, and not undertake to join the North to disturb the political balance of this country. I fancy that, in point of fact, that consideration entered into the treaty more deeply than anything else, though I am not in "the secrets of the prison house;" but, at any rate, I think no argument can be drawn from that in relation to the question before us.

What I said was merely in answer to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Louisiana himself. He said he would not vote to repeal these bounties if he supposed, in point of fact, the effect would be essentially to injure the business, and to put an end to it. I wished in that connection to have the gentleman understand that in point of fact the business of catching fish, as a whole, may not be injured, because the public demands will require the fish to be caught; but if the bounties be taken off, the effect will be to throw it into the hands of the British Provinces, and to breed sailors for the British Navy instead of the American Navy.

Now, if the great purpose of sustaining these fisheries really is and really has been a nursery of seamen—and gentlemen who have argued it on the two sides have certainly done the subject much justice, and the research they have displayed does them credit—let us look at the effect of the repeal in that aspect. If the condition of the country—without inquiring how we came to be in this condition, or charging blame on anybody in relation to it—be such as to call for the repeal of these bounties, the effect, though we should not destroy fishing altogether, would be that we should destroy the purpose intended to be effected by the keeping up of the bounties. That effect will be produced without the destruction of the business, though it may destroy it so far as this country is concerned.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President—

Mr. GREEN. I suggest that we postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, so that we may have an executive session.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to make a few remarks right here, in order to show how inconsistent the arguments of the advocates of a bad cause always prove themselves to be. From the treaty of peace with England in 1783, up to the recent reciprocity treaty, the whole history of the fisheries will show that the chief complaint of the cod fishermen of New England was that they were not permitted to catch fish within three miles of the shores of the British Provinces, and to cure them upon the shore; and they alleged that they could not come in successful competition with the English, because they were driven into the deep waters on the banks, and denied the privilege of hugging the shore, and curing the fish on shore. That was their great complaint.

Now they have this privilege accorded them. Now they are permitted to go within three miles of the shore, and even to cure their fish upon shore; and yet they complain of this treaty, and say that so far from benefiting them it has done them a great deal of injury. But how does that affect this question of nurturing seamen? The English Government maintained that the citizens of the United States had driven their fishermen off the banks; that they had quite monopolized the deep-sea fisheries; that they were nurturing seamen; but that their own fishermen going in their little smacks of five or twenty tons near to shore in the morning, and returning at night, did not learn seamanship, and hence as early as the day of Sir Josiah Child it was proposed absolutely to burn the small fishing smacks, and the fishermen's huts on the coast, in order to drive them out into the deep-sea fisheries to make them hardy and vigorous seamen, and force them into competition with American seamen.

Now, sir, the treaty, according to the argument which obtained in England, is another inducement for repealing the bounty. Now, our fishermen have the same privilege with the English of fishing within three miles of the coast, and curing their fish on the coast; and therefore, according to the English argument, the probability is that it will prove a worse school for fishermen than hitherto.

Again, during the last Congress, when I moved this bill, and spoke of the bounty as creating a privileged class, who are living upon tribute levied on other people, and perhaps characterized it as a cod-fish aristocracy that enjoyed the bounty mainly, the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] excepted to my remarks, and declared that it was a cod-fish Democracy that enjoyed the bounty, and he lauded the bounty as cheapening the food of the poor. He spoke of the cod fish as the main staple of food in the New England States, and that the tendency of the bounty was to reduce the price of cod fish, and therefore to increase the comforts of the poor. Now, we are told the effect of the reciprocity treaty has been to bring English fishermen in competition with our fishermen; that they are over stocking the market with their fish, and thereby reducing the price. Now the complaint is that the food is too cheap, too plentiful. The other day the complaint was that the food was too dear and too scarce, and we must so legislate as to increase the supply, and thereby reduce the price. Now, instead of preaching the doctrine of plenty, it is the doctrine of scarcity. The complaint is that they have too much food, that it is too cheap—too cheap in consequence of the competition we have afforded to the Englishmen under the reciprocity treaty. Well, sir, I should suppose that, unless the interests of the few fishermen—few in number compared with the residue of the people of New England, and the other States of the Union—unless their pockets are to be consulted and filled rather than the hunger and the stomachs of the vast majority of the people themselves, it ought to commend us rather to the reciprocity treaty. It cheapens food, and benefits the great mass thereby; but the few producers have their compensation for their labor thereby reduced.

Mr. GREEN. I now renew my motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m., in order to have an executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to introduce a bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my friend from New York yield to me?

Mr. MORGAN. I must decline to yield any further. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all Senate bills of a private nature on the Speaker's table, and on their first and second reading, be taken up and referred to the appropriate committees; and that in the consideration of the Private Calendar on Friday next, there shall be no debate in Committee of the Whole, and all bills that are not objected to shall be reported to the House and finally disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the resolution will be modified so as to include the call of committees.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that if it is the pleasure of the House to make Friday objection day, he had better include Saturday also. It will be impossible to get through the Calendar in one day.

Mr. MORGAN. We can have a long session, and there will be no debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are some very long reports. I think the gentleman had better include Saturday.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I hope the gentleman will include Saturday.

Mr. MORGAN. We can have that afterwards just as well; but I think we can get through on Friday.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object to the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to suspend the rules. The question was taken; and the rules were suspended by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I think we can get through on Friday. I object to any amendment, and move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask that an amendment, which I desire to offer as a substitute, may be read for information.

The proposed amendment was reported, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 15th day of May instant, shall be devoted to the consideration of private business; and after one hour shall have been given to the reports of committees, the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and will proceed to act upon bills, to the passage of which there shall be no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That will give us Friday for the transaction of business which shall give rise to discussion, and Saturday as objection day.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the consent of the gentleman from New York to add the following to his resolution:

And that during the present session, debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar shall be confined to fifteen minutes on any one bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Make it half an hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. No; fifteen minutes is long enough.

Mr. MORGAN. I insist on the demand for the previous question on my resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now call for the execution of the order under that resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LETCHER. What is it about?

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the United States consul at Amoy, China, compensation for judicial services under the act of Congress approved August 11, 1848, from the 1st of July, 1855, to the 1st of January, 1857, $1,500.

Mr. LETCHER. Should not that bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think its proper reference is to the Committee of Ways and Means, for the reason that it asks an appropriation of money, and because the same subject has been already referred to our committee, and considered by it. I have no other interest in having the bill referred to that committee. We have already considered the same question in regard to the consul at Shanghai.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A resolution (No. 21) devolving upon the Secretary of War the execution of the act of Congress entitled "An act supplemental to an act therein mentioned," approved December 22, 1854.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask to have that resolution put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be put on its passage under the resolution of the House.

Mr. SINGLETON. Can it not be done by the unanimous consent of the House?

The SPEAKER. It can be.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope that no one will make any objection to it. It does not propose to appropriate a single dollar out of the Treasury. It simply devolves on the Secretary of War the carrying out of an act passed in the Thirty-Third Congress.

Mr. DEAN. Let it take its course, Mr. Speaker. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BUSINESS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GOODE asked and obtained unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Monday and Tuesday, the 24th and 25th of the present month, be set apart for the consideration of business in relation to the District of Columbia, which business shall be made the special order for those days.

Mr. GOODE. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, in which the constituents of every member on this floor are interested:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be authorized to report to the House House bill No. 300, declaring the title of land warrants in certain cases; and that said bill be considered at this time.

This has relation to a bill which has received the unanimous sanction of the committee. It simply declares the title to land warrants in cases of the death of the applicant before the issuance of the warrant, and after his application.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to hear the bill read.

Mr. COBB. There can be no objection to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It might place many of these land warrants in a very curious condition.

Mr. KELSEY. The bill has been carefully considered in committee.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. This is a very useful bill; and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw any objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let it be read, so that we may understand what it is.

The bill was read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would have no objection to the bill if it merely put these warrants upon the same footing that they would be on if issued in the lifetime of the applicants. But suppose an applicant, who has filed his application and perfected the proof, should die before the warrant is issued: this bill proposes to give the warrant to the heirs of the applicant.

A MEMBER. Well, that is right.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No, sir; under the general law, if the soldier dies before the warrant is issued, it goes to the widow; if the widow dies before it is issued, it goes to the children; but there is no law to give it to the heirs generally; and if this bill is passed, giving it to the heirs, why, in the absence of a widow or children of the soldier who has rendered the service, then his brothers and sisters, or his next of kin—whether a cousin or of any other degree—would be entitled to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, that is exactly what happens if the warrant is issued before the soldier dies.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Is debate in order? The SPEAKER. It is not. Is there any objection to the resolution?

Mr. CLEMENS. I object. Before the bill passes I want it put in good English. It is not grammatical.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to suspend the rules. The question was taken; and the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. COBB then, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 300, de-declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move to amend the substitute, by striking out "has," in the sixth line, and inserting "have," so as to make it grammatical.

Mr. COBB. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not want to make a speech upon this bill, but I want some information regarding it.

Mr. COBB. What is the pleasure of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to know what becomes of a certain description of warrants. This bill, as I understand it, provides that where the application has been made and the right established, but the applicant dies before the warrant is issued, the warrant shall be issued to the heirs.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moved the previous question, but rose and propounded a question to the gentleman from Tennessee, which the Chair regarded as a waiver of the demand. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. COBB. No, sir, I do not. I am willing to give any gentleman any information in my power. I thought the bill was plain enough, and that everybody could understand it.

The bill and the substitute were again read.

Mr. REAGAN. As I understand this bill, it proposes to take this matter from under the jurisdiction of the probate courts, and until I understand something about that, I shall object to it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, pending the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CLEMENS's amendment to the substitute was adopted.

The substitute, as amended, was then adopted. The question recurred upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. It changes the law of the land.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if this bill is retrospective in its operation?

Mr. KELSEY. It applies to warrants already issued and hereafter to be issued.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That is right.

Mr. STANTON. I wish the gentleman from New York would amend, by striking out the word "heirs" and inserting the word "children."

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and the gentleman from New York has no right to accept an amendment.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COBB. I ask the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment. I think this bill does not accomplish the purpose the House has in view.

Mr. COBB. I cannot.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This bill certainly does not cover the cases of land warrants already issued, where the applicants died before they were issued.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman is satisfied that it does not, it ought to be amended; but it was the opinion of the Committee on Public Lands that it does cover the cases referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama cannot debate the bill pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COBB. If the Chair will listen to me for two minutes, I will show—

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no right to listen to the gentleman from Alabama pending the demand for the previous question, when objections are made to debate.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Alabama was going to withdraw the call for the previous question if the Chair would have given him two minutes to state the reason.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman had withdrawn his demand for the previous question before commencing to make his speech, he would have been in order.

Mr. COBB. I am not going to make any speech. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Now, sir, I desire to say a word in reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is pending.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I thought the previous question had been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was demanded on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Tennessee thinks the bill does not accomplish the purpose for which it was intended, I have no objection to his offering an amendment; and perhaps it will be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I will withdraw the demand.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I may be mistaken in my construction of this bill, but I think it does not accomplish the purpose for which it was intended. It provides that when proof has been, or shall hereafter be filed in the Pension Office during the lifetime of the claimant, establishing to the satisfaction of that office his or her right to a warrant for military service; and where such warrant shall not have been, or may not hereafter, be issued until after the death of the claimant, the title to such warrant shall vest in the widow, &c.

This makes provision where the warrant shall not have issued before the death of the applicant; but suppose it shall have issued, then the warrant does not, as I understand it, vest in the children or heirs of the deceased applicants. A claimant presents his application at the Department; it remains on file perhaps for twelve months. It then issues; but, before the date which the warrant bears, the claimant dies. Now, as I understand it, this bill does not dispose of that class of cases. The warrant does not vest in the children or heirs of the claimant, as I understand it. Some of the warrants of this class which have been heretofore issued, are in the hands of the children. Some of this class of warrants have been sent to me; and I, having information of the death of the applicants before the date of the warrant, have returned them to the Pension Office, where, I presume, they have been canceled. Other warrants which have issued after the death of the applicants are, as I have said, still in the hands of the children. This bill does not, as I understand it, cover that class of cases. It says, "if they have not, or shall not be issued," they shall vest in the heirs of those to whom they were issued; but those warrants that have been issued are not provided for.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to call the attention of the House to another provision of this bill. I am not opposed to the object of the bill, but in its present shape it does not accomplish the object for which it was intended. There is another section here which, I think, is inconsistent with the law, and which, instead of giving value to these warrants, will make their value still more uncertain. It seems to me that upon a measure like this, the effect of which is to change the laws of the country, the House might afford to give it a day's consideration. If other provisions are to be made, I think they should be so framed as to make the law more intelligible, and tend to fix the value of these warrants in the market.

The bill, as it now stands, provides that when proof has been, or shall hereafter be, filed in the Pension Office during the lifetime of the claimant, establishing, to the satisfaction of that office, his or her right to a warrant for military service; and where such warrant shall not have been, or may not hereafter be, issued until after the death of the claimant, the title to such warrant shall pass—and here I call the attention of the House particularly to this provision—shall vest in the widow, if there be one, and if there be no widow living, then it shall pass to the legal heirs of the warrantee; and that said warrants, and all other warrants issued pursuant to existing laws, shall be treated as personal chattels, and may be conveyed by assignment by such widow or heirs, or by the legal representatives of the deceased.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an inconsistency in this provision which will embarrass the sale of these warrants. I have no objection to its passage if it be put into a simple shape, either by saying that these land warrants under these circumstances shall go to the widow, and if there be no widow, to the legal representatives, or else take it from the legal representatives and not leave it in the confusion in which such a section as this would seem to leave it. I am not opposed to the measure. I am very willing, where there is a land warrant authorized to be issued or where it is issued in the name of the person before, but not received before his death, that there shall be every facility given by the law for its transfer to those to whom the law would like to have it go, or in such manner as to make it most available for the purpose of sale or location.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make a word of explanation. The Committee on Public Lands has had the subject before them for investigation, and they investigated it carefully. After this bill was matured by the committee, I took it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He examined it thoroughly, and seemed to think that it answered the purpose intended. The bill says that the warrant may be transferred by the widow, or the heirs, or the legal representatives, administrators, and executors, as you please. The object of the committee was to avoid complication in the matter. If there was a widow, it was intended she should have power to transfer the warrant; but if no widow, that that power should descend, with the warrant, to the heirs of age, so as to provide against the necessity of having an administrator to transfer it. In case the heirs should be minors, then it was provided that the administrators should be empowered to make a transfer of it. It is the opinion of the Committee on Public Lands, and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the measure avoids complication, and at the same time answers all the purposes intended. If I have the floor, I call for the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for a moment. I would like to say a word.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw it for the gentleman, if he will renew it.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have one word to say in relation to another provision of this bill, which strikes me as a departure from the whole spirit of the Government in granting bounty lands. I think that this is the first bill in which bounty lands have been so limited as to go to the heirs general, and become assets in the hands of the administrators. If I understand the policy of the Government, it has been to the effect that this is a personal grant for the benefit of the soldier, his widow, or his children, and is not intended for the benefit of his creditors. It is not intended that it shall be assets in the hands of his administrators to go in the course of distribution to the creditors or collateral heirs.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If I understand this bill, its object simply is to put these warrants, which may be issued, or have been issued, before the decease of the party, upon the same footing they would have held if the party had been living. If a warrantee has a warrant issued in his lifetime, he can sell or dispose of it as he pleases.

Mr. STANTON. I understand this bill to do something else. I understand when the warrant issues, after the death of the party who is entitled to it, after the proofs are completed, and before it is delivered to the general heirs, that it becomes assets in the hands of the administrators, and may be distributed to the creditors. It cannot be otherwise, because it provides that it shall go to his heirs general, and whatever descends, whatever personal property descends from the intestate to the heirs general, becomes assets, subject to the payment of his debts. That never has been the law heretofore. Undoubtedly it has been the law that a soldier could assign or sell his warrant, so that it would inure for his individual advantage; but it has never been the law that it shall go to his general creditors, and I object to that portion of the bill which makes these warrants go, on the death of the party, to his general creditors, and not to the widow or his children.

Mr. KELSEY. As I understand this bill, it limits the power of the legal representatives to sell and dispose of these land warrants for the benefit of the heirs of the deceased, and solely for that purpose, and they do not become general assets in the hands of the administrators or executors.

Mr. STANTON. It is a blind mode of legislation. I ask that the section be again read. I understand it to be the ordinary provision in the ordinary legal phraseology which passes the property to the heirs general, and makes it general assets. I think that the engrossment of the bill ought to be reconsidered. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right. It ought to be reconsidered, and amended in the particular I have mentioned. I call for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have an amendment, which I give notice that I will offer.

Mr. COBB. Let it be read, and it may be agreed to unanimously.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word claimant, in the seventh line, insert:
And all such warrants as have been heretofore issued subsequent to the death of the claimant.

Mr. COBB. I hope, if the House is of the opinion that the bill is not explicit enough, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LETCHER. I presume there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object until the motion is reconsidered.

The call for the previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was agreed to.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, submitted his amendment as an amendment to the substitute.

The amendment was read and agreed to; and then the substitute as amended was adopted.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, with authority to report to-morrow, when it shall be the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make a motion to recommit, but he cannot, without a two-thirds vote, give the committee the power to report at any time.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not want the bill to lose its position.

Mr. BURNETT. I call for the previous question.

Mr. JEWETT. I hope my colleague will withdraw that call for a moment.

Mr. BURNETT. I will if my colleague will renew it.

Mr. JEWETT. I will.

Mr. Speaker, I have paid some little attention to this bill, and I wish to reply to the remarks submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] on that clause of the bill which he believes declares warrants to be assets in the hands of the representatives. The bill does not contemplate, as the gentleman supposes, that the warrants shall be assets general for distribution amongst the creditors. The bill declares the title to the warrant to vest in the heirs. They are only assets for the purpose of distribution amongst the heirs, and not for distribution amongst the creditors general. It was adopted for the purpose of avoiding a suit in chancery by the heirs, to authorize a sale of the warrant. Where the heirs were numerous, no one was willing to make an entry or to locate the land, and a sale was necessary. Under the rules and regulations of the Department, it required much delay to secure an order for sale for the purpose of distributing the proceeds amongst the heirs general. It is to avoid that, and to authorize a sale by the personal representatives for distribution amongst the heirs, and not for distribution amongst the creditors, that the bill was framed as it was. I call for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COBB called for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. REAGAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. RUSSELL asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, to divide the State of New York into three judicial districts, for reference merely.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to suspend the rules.

The question was taken, and the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If the motion be objected to, it will require a two-thirds vote to agree to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. By general consent, on Friday last, the Minnesota bill was set down for to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

The SPEAKER. There are some twenty public bills on the table, which probably ought to be referred.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. It is my object only to get at those bills. If a bill is presented which any gentleman wants to be passed, very well; let the chance be given for action on it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it in order to move to amend the proposition by allowing bills and resolutions, of which previous notice has been given, to be introduced for reference merely?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly in order.

Mr. COLFAX. Will the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan include the resolution for abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the proposition had better be confined to Senate bills, and House bills with Senate amendments.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I accept that as my motion.

Mr. ENGLISH. I object, unless we proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table. If that be the motion, I will not object.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move that the rules be suspended.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended.

The resolution, as modified, was then agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of B. F. Rittenhouse, by leaving copies of the same.

The House then proceeded with the execution of the order in reference to bills on the Speaker's table.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

An act (H. R. No. 62) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1859, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was then taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out the following:

For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians,

$94,886.

For pay of eight professors at the Military Academy,

$16,000.

And insert in lieu thereof:

For pay of officers, instructors, cadets, and musicians,

$112,886.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendment is to restore to the professors at West Point the $20 per month which the House rejected. I move the previous question on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. If I understand it, the Senate insert the amendment which was stricken out by the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendment simply increases the appropriation sufficiently to allow the $20 per month to the professors at the Military Academy.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the Senate were then taken from the Speaker's table, severally read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

An act (No. 248) to amend or define the act of July 29, 1850, entitled "An act providing for recording the conveyances of vessels, and for other purposes." Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 204) to provide for issuing patents in certain cases when grants of the public lands have been or may be made to States by Congress. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

An act (No. 197) providing for the arrest and return of fugitives from justice to the District of Columbia. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An act (No. 127) to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment and license to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society. Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An act (No. 247) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," passed February 18, 1793. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act (No. 193) authorizing the issuing of certain bounty land warrants to the legal representatives of deceased persons entitled thereto. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DROPPED AND RETIRED NAVAL OFFICERS.

Joint resolution (S. No. 30) to extend for a further term the provisions of joint resolution approved March 10, 1858, in relation to certain dropped and retired officers of the Navy, was then taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. MILLSON. I hope the House will, by general consent, allow this resolution to be put upon its passage immediately. The object of the resolution is to allow the President six months, within which to consider the records of the courts of inquiry, so as to restore to the service those persons who, upon examination of the record, might appear to be entitled to be restored. But, though a law passed giving the President six months for that purpose, the House will perceive that he has not had six weeks, and unless this resolution should pass, he would have no time at all.

The object of this resolution is simply to give him an opportunity to examine these records. The Senate, upon being informed that it was absolutely impossible for the President to inspect these records of some forty-odd cases before the adjournment of the present session of Congress, has agreed to extend the time until the 1st of January next. Without that extension the act recently passed will be of no value whatever. I think this is all the explanation necessary to enable the House to understand the object of the bill, and with that explanation I think they will take up the bill and pass it without objection. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was then ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE SUSQUEHANNA.

A resolution (No. 33) authorizing suitable acknowledgments to be made by the President to the British naval authorities at Jamaica for the relief extended to the officers and crew of the United States ship Susquehanna, disabled by yellow fever, was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The resolution was then read in extenso.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LAND DISTRICTS IN MICHIGAN.

An act (S. No. 286) to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land districts, in Michigan, was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to put the bill upon its passage. It has been informally before the Committee on Public Lands, and has received the assent of that committee.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I will simply say to the House, that the only object and effect of this bill is to change the boundaries of these land districts in the State of Michigan. I will send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which will give a full explanation of the matter.

Several MEMBERS. Let it go.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Very well, then. I hope the bill will be passed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WALBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND DISTRICTS IN MINNESOTA.

An act (No. 296) amendatory of an act entitled "An act to establish two additional land districts in the Territory of Minnesota," approved July 8, 1856, was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. COBB. That is precisely such a case as the one just passed, and a little more so. The Committee on Public Lands have directed me to report a bill in the same language as that of the bill before the House; but for fear that the bill might not be reached by the House in time to meet the necessities of the case, it was suggested to the parties that they should go before the Senate. They did. The matter was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It was reported back by Senator STUART, and was immediately passed by the Senate. There is a necessity for the immediate passage of the bill, and I hope there will be no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS IN IOWA.

Senate resolution (No. 35) removing restrictions on a certain grant of five sections of land to the State of Iowa, was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It permits the State of Iowa to make use of five sections of land, heretofore granted to aid in the construction of public buildings there, for other purposes.

Mr. COBB. That appears to be a matter of some importance.

Mr. CURTIS. The resolution explains itself. I am satisfied that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, if he understands it, will not require it to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. There is no occasion for such a reference. The land in question was given to the State some years ago for the purpose of aiding in the construction of public buildings in the State. It was supposed that the capital would be located on these lands, but the location was not deemed suitable, and a different location has been adopted. The present location of the capital is some forty miles from these lands, which were at a point remote from wood and water, on a large prairie. It has been located at the city of Des Moines, on the Des Moines river. This resolution merely provides that the State may dispose of the lands for other purposes. Let the bill be read again.

Mr. COBB. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, and I make the motion to so refer it. It is important that we should investigate the matter. We can report it back in a very short time. I assure the gentleman that it will have prompt consideration, and if it is right, we will say so.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I desire to propound a question to the gentleman from Iowa before I cast my vote. I understand that these lands were granted to the State of Iowa some seven years ago, to aid in the construction of public buildings, assuming that the capital was to remain at that point. It was subsequently located at another point. I want to know whether Congress made an additional grant for public buildings at the new location?

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; there has been no other appropriation.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Then, I hope it will be put upon its passage.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to hear what these lands are worth? and for what purpose they are proposed to be used?

Mr. CURTIS. I believe that the lands are now worth from five to eight dollars an acre. They can be applied to the purpose to which they were appropriated; but it is desirable that the State should have the right to appropriate them to other purposes. It has been proposed to apply them to an agricultural school.

Mr. LETCHER. If the land can be applied to the purpose for which it was granted in the first instance, why do they want to divert it to some other purpose?

Mr. CURTIS. I have stated that the capital is not located on this ground, but some forty miles from it. The lands ought to be thus vacant. The State desires the privilege of disposing of them. I believe it is not the purpose to apply them to the construction of a capitol, but to the establishment of an agricultural school. I suppose that it makes no difference to Congress to what purpose the lands shall be applied. The State has actually erected a building which will answer the purposes of a capitol for many years.

Mr. LETCHER. The establishment of agricultural schools seems to be the order of the day, for it is only ten days ago that we had up a bill granting millions of acres for the purpose of agricultural colleges—among other States to Iowa—and now it is proposed to get up another rival scheme, so that Iowa may come in for a double share over all the other States.

Mr. CURTIS. There is certainly in my mind no opposition to the bill we recently passed for an agricultural college. I am not certain that the Legislature will apply these lands to agricultural schools. I have only said that has been proposed.

But let me tell the gentleman that Iowa, so far from getting more than her share in this arrangement, does not get her full share, although I voted for that bill for the purpose of doing what some thought to be justice to the old States—like Virginia—which have not heretofore had school grants as Iowa has.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to know what the share of Iowa is, according to my friend's estimate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that both the gentlemen are getting off from the matter under consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. I move the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. We are distinctly on this question of lands, and ascertaining what part Iowa gets for agricultural schools.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the bill about agricultural schools.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman says that these lands are to be so applied. So far as that matter is concerned, Iowa got a pretty liberal allowance last Congress for railroads. She has got another appropriation for the establishment of common schools; and now she comes here and asks for these lands for an agricultural school.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a point of order. It is not the privilege of the gentleman from Iowa to yield the floor without the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa as surrendering the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understood he was on the floor to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand it. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa as concluding his remarks, and asking that the bill might be again read. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Arkansas, and subsequently the gentleman from Virginia. The Chair understands now that the gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor; and the gentleman from Iowa rises to an explanation.

Mr. LETCHER. I now move that this matter be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; then I move the previous question on that motion.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

An act (S. No. 218) amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for executing the public printing, and establishing the prices thereof, and for other purposes," approved August 26, 1852, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Printing.

HUNGARIAN SETTLERS IN IOWA.

An act (No. 300) for the relief of the Hungarian settlers upon certain tracts of land in Iowa, hitherto reserved from sale by order of the President, dated January 22, 1855, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage. It is a bill voted unanimously by the Senate. To effect the object for which it is intended, it is necessary that this bill should be speedily acted upon.

The bill was read. It extends for one year the right of preemption to their lands to Hungarian settlers on certain lands in Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa. I understand that these lands are to be put up for sale within fourteen days. The settlers upon them are represented to be unable to enter their lands, for the reason that the principal persons who first settled on that land, and who had the privilege of preempting them under the act of Congress, have removed from them, leaving the poorer portion of the settlers on the land. They are unable to pay for these lands, and only ask for the extension of one year from the time of the passage of this act. It is only carrying out the original intention of Congress in favor of these Hungarians.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is this only extending the time for one year to enable these parties to preempt their lands?

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa. That is the whole of the act.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I am satisfied that this bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, and I make that motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

The first question was on the motion to refer to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COBB called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLISS and BRYAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 85.

Mr. COBB demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to commit the bill was disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question was then on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I am not certain that upon an investigation of all the principles contained in the bill, I should be opposed to it, but here is a bill from the Senate containing perhaps over a hundred quarter sections—

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa. No, sir, only thirty or forty.

Mr. COBB. Well, sir, there is not a member of the House who can state the exact bearing of the bill. Now, sir, the Committee on Public Lands have had a great many propositions before them during the present session to permit persons to enter lands, and we have invariably provided that the lands to be entered shall be at $1 25 an acre. Large grants of lands have been made to Iowa for railroad purposes, on the condition that the alternate sections within six miles of the lines of railroads shall be sold at $2 50 an acre. But this bill would allow these persons to enter those lands at $1 25 an acre in violation of that law.

Now, I do not know that any of the lands referred to in this bill lie within six miles of any railroad to which a grant has been made; but if they do, then these persons should pay the same amount for the lands that all others have to pay. Iowa has had three or four million acres of the public lands granted to her for railroad purposes, on the condition that the alternate sections should be reserved at the minimum price of $2 50 an acre. And now the gentleman from Iowa asks us to pass this bill rapidly, and without consideration in the Committee on Public Lands, because these men are poor men and the lands are about to be brought into market. Well, sir, if we are to make provision for these men because they are poor and cannot now pay for their lands, we should make a similar provision for poor men in other parts of Iowa, and in California, and in Kansas, and Nebraska, and elsewhere where lands are now being offered for sale. They should be allowed the same extension of time. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he should amend the bill so as to provide that if any of the reserved sections are embraced in this bill, the usual price of $2 50 shall be paid for them.

The gentleman states that these lands are about to be brought into market. Well, if he can show any particular reason why they should not be brought into market, and sold, I am satisfied that the President of the United States, knowing that legislation is pending before the House and has passed the Senate, will postpone the sale until the House can deliberately consider the bill. I tell the gentleman from Iowa that, if the bill is sent to the Committee on Public Lands, it will have prompt consideration; and I tell other gentlemen who have measures before that committee, that, whenever we are able to report, we will endeavor to do them all justice. We have many reports ready to make, and shall have an opportunity to present them if gentlemen will go on with the regular order of business. I have very little doubt that the President will postpone the sale of these lands until the House can act upon the question. I have now discharged my duty, and yield the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I am satisfied that the gentleman always discharges his duty as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. I give him credit for always doing what he thinks right; but I wish to explain to the gentleman that this reservation is off the line of any railroad. It lies in the southern part of Decatur county, through which no railroad grant passes. I would be perfectly willing to put a provision in the bill such as the gentleman from Alabama suggests; but the bill would then have to go back to the Senate, which would delay the passage till after the lands are exposed to sale.

Mr. COBB. It is difficult to tell where the railroads run in Iowa.

Mr. CURTIS. There has been only one grant to a railroad in the southern portion of the State, and that grant was to what is called the Burlington road. But these lands are in Decatur county, a tier of counties south of the Burlington line; so the Burlington grant is twenty or thirty miles north of the Hungarian settlement.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The Senate have passed the bill. What difficulty could grow out of the adoption of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CURTIS. I know of none except that it would take time. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall be put in. I would rather have it in than not, although it would be mere surplusage. But let me say one word in regard to the object of passing the bill at once. The sale of these lands is to come off, I believe, on the 17th of this month, and it is necessary that the bill should pass immediately; otherwise they will be sold, and beyond the reach of these settlers.

Now, who are these men that ask this right of preemption? They are the refugees who came from Hungary, some years ago, with the unfortunate patriot Kossuth, and were received, as gentlemen will remember, with distinguished consideration by the people of the United States. They were encouraged to settle in our country, and they were received and cordially welcomed by the people of Iowa, and have since lived on the public domain as other settlers, with a perfect understanding that they were to have preemption rights. The captain and leader, Governor Ujhazy, who first established the colony, removed to a warmer climate. He went to Texas; and, I believe, now resides there. From that fact it would be difficult to prove up the claims, as some who now live on his lands are assignees; and it may be there are some of them precluded on the ground that they are aliens. All they wish, and all this bill provides for, is to allow these men to go on and prove up their claims, the same as other preceptors, paying the same price that other citizens have to pay.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would suggest, as this matter seems likely to provoke some discussion, that if the House will allow the second section of the bill to be read, they will see there is nothing in it but to give these poor men twelve months to pay for their lands, which have been advertised to be sold; and, unless this law is passed, they will be sold, and the lands may go into the hands of speculators.

Mr. CURTIS. It is not the object of this bill to afford to these settlers any privileges other than are allowed to other settlers upon the public lands; but to extend to them the same rights which others enjoy. They do not ask for any other rights or privileges.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the House will hear the second section of the bill read, that will explain the whole matter.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the whole bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa whether this bill provides preemption rights for any who are not living on the lands?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I call the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does not this bill give credit to those who do not want it as well as to those who do?

Mr. CURTIS. The bill names the persons who are entitled to enter under it by giving a year to prove up their claims.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. This bill, then, gives them the use of the money for a year, no matter how much they may have.

Mr. CURTIS. These men are poor, and will be glad to pay for their land, and get their titles as soon as possible. None of them would desire the credit if they did not need it. I have already said the bill merely gives them the same right of preemption which is usually enjoyed by other settlers. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act making appropriations for the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1859; when the Speaker signed the same.

KEEPING OF THE CALIFORNIA ARCHIVES.

An act (No. 312) to provide for the collection, and safe-keeping of public archives in the State of California was next taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to put that bill on its passage.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have no doubt there is a necessity for some means to be provided for the preservation of those records. This bill, however, provides such a multitude of penalties, and goes so much into detail, that I prefer to have it examined by the Judiciary Committee; and I therefore move that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. SCOTT. It is the first time I have heard the bill read, and it strikes me to be merely a penal statute providing certain punishments for certain crimes in reference to meddling improperly with the public records of California. Even if I were fully posted on the matter, and wished to defend the bill, I am too unwell to do it. If the gentleman from Mississippi, or any other gentleman, thinks that it is not a proper bill, and ought to be looked into, I will not object to its reference; but on listening to the bill, I do not see anything objectionable in it. If the gentleman will point out anything objectionable to it, I am willing to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The late hour of the session is the only thing which presses action on the bill now.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Speaker, of course with the first reading of the bill I cannot form a perfect idea of its operation in respect to all the cases provided for. There is a single feature which struck me as demanding the attention of this House, or at least of the Committee on the Judiciary. That feature of the bill is the power given under the circumstances to enter houses and make searches for papers. I do not think that that provision is well guarded, and it may be that under it authority may be given to search into the private papers of private individuals. There was some provision made for the preservation of the records of my own State at the time she was changing from a Territory to a State, and I have no objection to a proper provision for California. Nor have I any objection to the section of the bill which provides that in certain cases where the original cannot be furnished, a copy may be put in evidence. But this thing requires an examination. I am unwilling to vote on the subject until I have examined it.

Mr. SCOTT. I accede to the gentleman's proposition, and agree that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 313) to amend an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," passed March 3, 1857.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that that bill be put on its passage.

The bill was read in extenso; and was then ordered to be read a third time; it was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

An act (No. 314) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in land titles in California, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time; and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a joint resolution to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled, 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

BATH (MAINE) CUSTOM-HOUSE.

An act (S. No. 307) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old custom-house and site in Bath, Maine, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage. There is no necessity for referring it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I do not see that any provision is made in the bill for the manner of sale.

The SPEAKER. It is by auction to the highest bidder.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

RUFUS DWINEL.

An act (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of 9th of February, 1858, calling for the names and residences of invalid pensioners admitted to the roll since March 3, 1849; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking for an appropriation to be expended in the prosecution of the work on certain public buildings.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to inquire what these public buildings are, so that we may see whether the communication should not be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The appropriations are asked for the extension of the Treasury building, &c. They come properly before the Committee of Ways and Means.

The communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 32) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liabilities of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. On a former occasion the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, but not being engrossed, its third reading was objected to at the time, which carried the bill to the Speaker's table.

Mr. GARNETT. I see that that bill stands second upon the list of bills upon the Speaker's table, on their third reading. I hope the House will take up the bills in the order in which they stand, and get through with the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There are only four bills there.

Mr. ENGLISH. How many bills remain upon the Speaker's table? I understand there are but few, and we might as well dispose of them.

The SPEAKER. There are four bills. The first is a private bill, for the relief of William K. Jennings and others; the second is the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, in relation to the liabilities of ship-owners; the third is to prevent inconvenient accumulation of certain papers in the Post Office; and the fourth is the joint resolution concerning the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to all the bills being taken up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All but the last—the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let us take them all up.

Mr. WADE. I believe my bill stands first.

The SPEAKER. It is the first public bill.

Mr. WADE. I am willing to modify my motion so as to take up all the public bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ENGLISH. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table in its order on the Calendar.

Mr. WADE. I want to take up House bill No. 32 first.

Mr. GARNETT. I shall object unless the bills are to be taken up in their order. There are but four of them, and the House can dispose of them in a very short time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand what motion the gentleman from Ohio makes.

Mr. WADE. I will adhere to my original motion, to take up House bill No. 32.

Mr. GARNETT. I object.

Mr. WADE. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If that motion fails I will move to suspend the rules to proceed to the remaining business on the Speaker's table.

The House divided on Mr. WADE's motion; and there were—ayes 73, noes 53.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the remaining business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 102, noes 18.

WM. K. JENNINGS AND OTHERS.

The first business in order was a bill (S. No. 29) for the relief of William K. Jennings and others, on which Mr. GIDDINGS was entitled to the floor.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I yield the floor to my colleague near me, [Mr. BLISS.]

Mr. BLISS. I desire to move to refer the bill with instructions, and I wish to be heard upon that motion. I will send up the instructions to be read at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, and is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of the fund heretofore received from Great Britain, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, for slaves taken and carried away by the forces of Great Britain during the war of 1812, (provided so much thereof remains unexpended,) which is hereby appropriated for that purpose, to William K. Jennings, and Aphia Jennings his wife, the sum of $1,120, it being the assessed value of four slaves carried off by the British forces, in the month of June, 1813, the said William K. and Aphia Jennings being the legal representatives of William Bean, deceased, who was the representative of Sarah Almond, his sister, who died in his lifetime, and who had lost three of the said slaves, namely, a negro woman, named Esther, and two children, the said Bean having lost another of said slaves, a negro man, named Sam; to Henry A. Wise the sum of $380, the assessed value of a negro man-slave, named Nelson, taken and carried away, as aforesaid, in December, 1814; to Ann Robinson the sum of $380, it being the assessed value of a negro slave, named Hampton, the right to whom is in said Ann Robinson, taken and carried away from Virginia, as aforesaid, in June, 1813; and to Edward Rudd the sum of $1,680, the assessed value of six slaves, namely, a negro man named Stephen, a negro woman named Cinner, and four children, taken and carried away from Virginia, as aforesaid, in the spring of 1813; and to the legal representatives of Robert Lindsay, deceased, the sum of $390, it being the assessed value of a negro man-slave, named Ned, taken and carried away, as aforesaid, from the possession of his owner, in the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina; to the legal representatives of Benjamin Hodges, of the State of Maryland, the sum of $380, it being the value of a slave conveyed from the United States on board the British fleet, in the year 1814, and not recovered by the said Hodges, or his legal representatives.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire if it is the gentleman's purpose to put that bill on its passage? If so, I rise to a question of order that this bill, making an appropriation, must of necessity be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I hope, however, that there will be no disposition to press it to a vote to-day, and that there will be no necessity for making the question.

Mr. BLISS. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with specific instructions, which I will indicate before I sit down. I would have the instructions first read, but that the language will be better understood after I shall have spoken.

I wish to say, in the outset, that, owing to the advanced stage of the session, I do not propose to go into a general discussion of the policy of the treaty with Great Britain upon which this claim purports to be founded, or upon the question of slavery, or, rather, of the rightfulness of recognizing slaves as property under any circumstances whatever, which would be legitimately open for discussion in commenting on the bill now under consideration.

I do not waive or ignore my well-known opinion on that subject. But I propose to show that this claim is not embraced in any manner or form whatever, in the treaty to which reference is made in the bill; and that instead of being embraced in that treaty, it is expressly excluded by its terms. For the reason I have stated, I shall confine my remarks to that question.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised that this bill should be here. But, sir, since it was brought before us on a former occasion, I have given it some examination, and I find it to be one of those old, rotten, stale claims that have been before Congress for the last twenty years, and that always, whenever they have been brought to the light and exposed, have instinctively sought the shelter of darkness. This is a claim of a character which would not command the attention of the House for a moment, were it not for the fact that it recognizes property in man, that it provides for the payment for slaves.

I for one should object to it even if that were the only objection. But it comes here a stale and groundless claim, without a single feature to recommend it to the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House, but the fact I have before stated, that it recognizes property in slaves and provides for their payment. It rests upon a basis which could not be maintained for a moment in relation to any species of property, generally admitted to be such, and were it a claim for horses, or ships, or houses, or lands, would be driven out of the House.

Mr. Speaker, that we may understand perfectly the character of this claim, it will be necessary that I should refer briefly to the history of the treaties under which it has arisen. The first treaty was made in 1782 with Great Britain, and may be found in volume eight of the Statutes at Large, page 57. I do not propose to read it now, but simply to refer to it in order to account for the fact that a subsequent treaty is in existence. There was a clause in that treaty which provided for the payment of negroes taken by Great Britain during the war. The American Government claimed that the slaves which had escaped to the British should be returned. Great Britain protested against the recognition of a claim of that character, assuming that where slaves had escaped under inducements held out to them, that they should be entitled to their freedom. It would be "odious," unjust, to require them to be returned. No State could be guilty of such bad faith. After full consideration the administration of General Washington abandoned the claim as untenable. I refer gentlemen who may wish to prosecute their inquiries any further in reference to this treaty, to the first volume of the American State Papers, pages 485 and 486, where they will find a letter from our Minister in England, (Mr. Jay,) in which he relates the circumstances under which he virtually abandoned the claim. After the Jay treaty nothing further was seen or heard of the claims; and it is not strange that Great Britain was betrayed into the use of similar though less decisive language in the treaty of Ghent, by our giving up every claim under the former. The treaty of Ghent, which is to be found in the eighth volume of the Statutes at Large, contains these words:

"All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other, during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property."

I will first call the attention of the House to the various provisions of the various treaties upon the subject, and afterwards will ask its attention to this bill in connection with these various provisions. The same dispute arose under the treaty of Ghent that had arisen upon the revolutionary treaty. Great Britain claimed that she was under no obligation to pay for slaves which had escaped during the war, for the purpose of being enrolled in her legions, or otherwise, or had been transferred to the West Indies; she had promised them protection, and could not deliver them up with any decency or honor, and claimed that she was only bound not to carry away any "slaves or other private property" actually "captured," not received as fugitives, and under the circumstances mentioned in the clause before quoted. Negotiations between the two Governments were had upon the subject, with more or less intermissions, until 1818, when the matter was closed, or attempted to be closed, by arbitration. Arrangements were made for submitting the matter to arbitration, and the question in dispute was submitted to the Emperor of Russia.

On pages 292 and 294 of the same volume of treaties, we find the award which was made April 28, 1822. The reasons for the delay it is not necessary to give.

The Emperor is of opinion—

"That the United States of America are entitled to a just indemnification from Great Britain, for all private property carried away by the British forces; and as the question regards slaves more especially, for all such slaves as were carried away by the British forces, from the places and territories of which the restitution was stipulated by the treaty, in quitting the said places and territories.

"That the United States are entitled to consider as having been so carried away, all such slaves as may have been transported from the above-mentioned territories on board of the British vessels within the waters of the said territories, and who, for this reason, have not been restored.

"But that, if there should be any American slaves who were carried away from territories, of which the first article of the treaty of Ghent has not stipulated the restitution to the United States, the United States are not to claim an indemnification for said slaves.

"The Emperor declares, besides, that he is ready to exercise the office of mediator, which has been conferred on him beforehand by the two States, in the negotiation which must ensue between them in consequence of the award which they have demanded."

The whole question in dispute was decided in favor of the United States, and against the construction given by Great Britain. In order to carry into effect this award, on the 12th of July, 1822, another treaty was entered into between the United States and Great Britain, with a view to close the whole matter upon the basis of the award. After reciting the award, the first section of this last treaty (page 284) provides for the appointment of a board, consisting of two commissioners and two arbitrators, one of each to be chosen by each Power, and for their oath, and the manner of filling vacancies. Article two provides for the manner of assessing by this board of the average value for the slaves claimed to be embraced in the treaty. Article three provides as follows:

"When the average value of slaves shall have been ascertained and fixed, the two commissioners shall constitute a board for the examination of the claims which are to be submitted to them, and they shall notify to the Secretary of State of the United States that they are ready to receive a definite list of the slaves, and other private property, for which the citizens of the United States claim indemnification; it being understood and hereby agreed that the commission shall not take cognizance of, nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for any claims for private property under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, not contained in the said list."

Difficulties still arose in executing the award; and on the 13th of November, 1826, after having been, like many other finalities, many times finally determined, I believe it was really finally closed up, so far as negotiations between the United States and Great Britain were concerned. The final convention is to be found on page 344 of the same volume. The following are articles one and two of this convention:

"ART. I. His Majesty, the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, agrees to pay, and the United States of America agree to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the said decision and convention, the sum of $1,201,939, current money of the United States, in lieu of, and in full and complete satisfaction for, all sums claimed or estimable from Great Britain, by any person or persons whatsoever, under the said decision and convention.

"ART. II. The object of the said convention being thus fulfilled, that convention is hereby declared to be canceled and annulled, save and except the second article of the same, which has already been carried into execution by the commissioners appointed under the said convention, and save and except so much of the third article of the same as relates to the definitive list of claims, and has already likewise been carried into execution by the said commissioners."

So, we see that this convention was intended to be a substitute for the whole of the treaty of July 12, 1822, except the reservations made in article two, just read. By the express terms of that article, the provisions of the former treaty as to the value of the slaves, and as to the "definitive list" furnished by the Secretary of State, were again affirmed. The definitive list of the property for which Great Britain agreed to pay over to the United States, in trust, some twelve hundred thousand dollars, had been made out and presented by our Secretary of State. This treaty expressly provides that the provisions of the old treaty in relation to this definitive list should continue in full force. It expressly confirms and ratifies them; and I ask again the special attention of the House to the provision so ratified:

"When the average value of slaves shall have been ascertained and fixed, the two commissioners shall constitute a board for the examination of the claims which are to be submitted to them, and they shall notify to the Secretary of State of the United States that they are ready to receive a definite list of the slaves, and other private property, for which the citizens of the United States claim indemnification; it being understood, and hereby agreed, that the commission shall not take cognizance of, nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for, any claims for private property under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, not contained in said list."

The United States, in the legislation which became necessary under the treaty of 1826, passed an act, which is found in volume 4 of the Laws, page 219. That act provides as follows:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all records, documents, and other papers, which were in possession of the commissioners constituting the mixed commission under the treaty of Ghent, so far as the same are under the control of the Government of the United States, shall be delivered to the commissioners under this act.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall proceed immediately after their meeting in the city of Washington, with all convenient dispatch, to arrange and docket the several claims, and to consider the evidence which shall have been, or which may be, offered by the respective claimants, allowing such further time for the production of such further evidence as they may require as they shall think reasonable and just; and they shall thereupon proceed to determine the said claims, and to award distribution of the said fund among the several claimants, according to their respective rights.

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make all needful rules and regulations not contravening the laws of the land, the provisions of this act, or the provisions of the said treaty and convention, for carrying their said commission into full and complete effect."

It will be at once seen that this act is based entirely upon the treaties, and does not go beyond them. The act provides for commissioners, and that the papers, &c., of the mixed commission shall be delivered up to them; that the new commissioners shall proceed "to arrange and docket the several claims," and that they may make rules not contravening "the provisions of said treaty and convention." From what did they make their docket? From this "definitive list," clearly. The United States had no power to go beyond it by the terms of the treaties, and did not attempt to do so. The commissioners, when they had concluded their action, found that there was a small sum left, which these claimants are after.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have alluded to these laws and treaties briefly, yet, I think, with sufficient clearness that my points will be understood. In the first place, there is no evidence before the House that those persons, claimed to be slaves, ever escaped. This bill comes before us, and is now upon its passage, without inquiry, and we are to vote upon it, unless the motion I have offered for its reference prevail. We are called upon to vote for it without any inquiry whatever, either in respect to the law or the facts of the case. We have no evidence that any of these claimants has even a shadow of a claim that any one of these slaves ever escaped to the British fleet; but, on the other hand, we may fairly presume that there is no evidence on the subject. The report of the committee of the Senate shows that, as to a large majority of these persons, there could be no specific evidence before them that they had escaped. The Senate committee reports, in general, that they escaped some time during the war; but, from the looseness of their report they could have no clear and definite testimony on the subject.

Most of the gentlemen here are lawyers; and I ask them what must be the character of the evidence that warrants only such loose and indefinite conclusions? If these persons escaped to the British fleet the claimants are able to show it—to show the time when they escaped, and the circumstances under which they escaped. In regard to one of the claims, the circumstances are given; but in regard to the large mass of them, no circumstances whatever are given; but merely those loose declarations, that the slaves escaped "some time during the war of 1812." We have no evidence on the subject; and without any substantial fact on which we can found an opinion, we are asked to guess at facts, and to vote upon this bill without any evidence whatever.

Again, we have no evidence that they were carried away after the signing of the treaty; and I call the attention of the House specifically to the award of the Emperor of Russia, as well as to the language of the treaty. Unless these persons were carried away from the United States by the British forces, while they were lying in the waters of the United States, after the formation of the treaty, it is not pretended or claimed by any person that there is any claim whatever on the United States for payment for those slaves.

Here is a trust fund. Great Britain, in pursuance of her obligations as interpreted by Russia, has paid over to us a fund in trust for a specific purpose to pay for persons who escaped to their fleet, and were carried away at a specific time, and at no other time, and who had been embraced in a specific list. And now we are called upon to vote for payment for persons who may have been carried away, if at all, as well before the treaty as after. Not only that; but there is evidence on the record, that some of these persons for whom claims are made were carried away before, and not after, the signing of the treaty. I said when I first rose, that this was an old, stale claim. It has often been before our committees, and I find a report made upon part of this claim by the Committee of Claims, August 20, 1822. Mr. Cowen, from the Committee of Claims, made the report; and without investigating any of the questions as to whether these persons were embraced in the definitive list, or as to whether there was evidence of their escape, the claim was rejected on these grounds:

"To bring a case for the detention of a slave by the British within the rule of this article of the treaty, it must be shown that the slave was, at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, in some place which, by said treaty, was to be restored to the United States, and then occupied by the British forces. It is not enough to show that property was taken by the British, and by them retained, to establish a right to payment out of this fund. The property must have been in the possession of the enemy, in a place within the United States, at the time of the exchange of the ratification of the treaty.

"The proof in this case shows that the slave in question went off with the British army in August, 1814, and that it has not been returned; but it is not shown where the slave was after that period. This fund belongs to a particular description of claimants. It is not in the option of Congress to divert it to other uses than those for which it was received. A sufferer whose loss is in one particular, but not in others, within the provisions of this article, has no more claim to compensation than any other person who suffered by the wrongful acts of the British forces during the last war with Great Britain. Without stopping to inquire whether the commission for adjudicating claims arising under this treaty has or has not expired, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the petitioner is not entitled to relief."

Then, so far as this House possesses any basis for action, we must vote down this claim. We have the express finding of the Committee of Claims, that, as to a portion of these persons, they were not embraced in the treaty, because there is no evidence that they were taken away after the conclusion of the treaty. The bill itself undertakes to recite some facts, but omits this material one. The Senate report entirely ignores it; and no man can furnish any evidence that can bring the claims, in this respect, within the treaty. Look to the Russian award: it is clear and explicit on this point, and there is not a shadow of a claim for anything not carried away after the treaty—"in quitting the places," &c.

Again, as you will recollect by referring to the treaties with Great Britain on this subject which I have read, it was expressly provided in these two separate treaties, and ratified by the United States in the act of 1827, that the appropriation of this money should be confined to the persons who were embraced in a "definitive list." There were two commissioners and two arbitrators on behalf of Great Britain and the United States. They fixed the value of the losses, and the commissioners were to adjudicate the claims. A definitive list of the "slaves and other property" was made out, and furnished to them by the Secretary of State. The claims embraced in that list, and none others, were to be adjudicated by those commissioners, and they undertook to pass upon them; but finding difficulties in the way, Great Britain, rather than have anything further to do in the matter, concluded to pay a gross sum; but only on express condition that the money thus paid should be held in trust by the United States for the persons embraced in that list. By two separate treaties the faith of the United States was bound to appropriate the money to those who were embraced in that list, and to none others whatever. By the very terms of the treaty, all that were not embraced in the list are expressly excluded from all participation in the benefits of the fund. The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] who reported a bill the other day, and who carried it through the House, understood the full force of the treaty, and ascertained, before he presumed to report the bill to the House, that the property to be paid for out of that same fund was embraced in that list, and also that it was carried away subsequently to the ratification of the treaty. And now we are called upon to misappropriate a fund, to act in bad faith, to act in violation of the treaties, and to appropriate the money to persons who have no claim whatever to it; merely because the property claimed to have been carried away consisted of slaves.

Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Louisiana, to whom I have referred, reported from the Committee of Claims a claim for a vessel that was carried away, he and his committee thought it necessary to require proof that that vessel was one coming within the terms of the treaty. He found it necessary to show, in his report, that the vessel was carried away subsequently to the ratification of the treaty; also, that it was embraced in the list, or this House would not have entertained the claim for a moment. He did show it, and the bill passed this House, and will, doubtless, pass the Senate. It came fairly within the treaty, and was a just claim. And I will remark here, that those who are pressing this claim will get but little unless they can get this dishonest claim in ahead of that honest one. If we pass this bill now, such will be the effect of our action, for the bill for the paying the just claim for the vessel, has not yet, I believe, passed the Senate; and if we drive this through here to-day, we shall defraud the honest claimant, and for the benefit of those who have no claim at all.

Now, sir, suppose you do appropriate this fund in the manner proposed, and prove false to your treaty obligations to Great Britain: what will be your position as trustee? I do not know the amount or the value of the property still remaining on the list unpaid for. I know that there are claims for eight or ten thousand dollars on the list, for other than slaves, which claims may be honest, for aught I know. We have passed upon one this session that was good. Others will doubtless be presented, coming within the treaty, and far more than enough to swallow up the pittance there is said to be left. Now, if we give away this money, in violation of the trust, in violation of our treaty obligations, to those who are not entitled to it, when these honest claimants come forward with their claims, how will those who are now pressing these claims meet them? Having squandered the money, will they deny it to its rightful owners? Will they tell them "we have paid over the money which Great Britain placed into our hands for your use, for certain negro slaves, not embraced in the list, because slave property is so much higher and holier than all other property; that the owners of the lost slaves had a better claim than you, notwithstanding that you were on the list and that your claim was provided for, when theirs was not?" If we thus misappropriate this fund, and violate our obligations as trustee, shall we not be bound to provide for these honest claims, not by an appropriation of the money paid by Great Britain, under the provisions of the treaty for the specific purpose, but by a direct appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States? I know not whether gentlemen intend to initiate the policy in the United States of paying for all the slaves who run away. I do not believe that we have yet quite come to that, that slave property is so much more sacred, and so far above all other property, that it is entitled to be paid for when lost in preference to all other property. We have never yet voted to sanction such a principle as that. The former practice was not to treat slaves as property, not to pay for them when taken for public use, but to regard them as persons only. During this session, it is true, we, or some of us, have voted, in endeavoring to enforce the Lecompton constitution, that slaves are property, like other property, yet that was a great innovation. But none of us have heretofore sought to place it above other property, to make it so sacred that the United States should be compelled to pay for it under circumstances when they would not be called upon to pay for anything which is property, by the common law and the consent of Christendom. And yet, this bill does all that. We cannot use a trust fund other than for the cestui que trust. If we give the money to others, it is a mere gift, and we are still holden to the beneficiary. So if we pay for the slaves, we pay for them because they were slaves. Our houses burned, our cattle, our goods, our ships that were taken by the enemy, are wholly lost to us, unless embraced in the letter of the treaty. This, then, is a bill to offer a bounty to the ownership of slaves, and it is nothing less.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I do not now propose to go into the inquiry as to whether we ought to pay for slaves, even if they were embraced in the treaty. I am relieved from that inquiry. It is now a simple question, as I understand the facts in the case, whether we shall violate our treaty obligations—whether we shall pay these persons who are excluded from the provisions of the treaty. It is a simple question whether we shall pay this old, rotten, stale claim, because it is a claim for slaves, and not because it has merits, and that is all the question there is in it. We are called upon to vote it through without the usual reference, and without knowing anything about it, except what we learn from the records of the country, and are able to find independent of the investigation of a committee.

I stated at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that before I took my seat I should move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I prefer to give it that reference, because the inquiry embraces grave matters of law. It is simply a question of law. I understand that there is no dispute about any question of fact. I understand that it is not disputed that these claimants are excluded by the terms of the treaty. It is not claimed that they are on the "definitive list," or that the slaves were taken away by the British forces after the consummation of the treaty. All that the claimants expect to prove is, that the slaves escaped to the British forces, and were probably taken away by them at some time or other; and we are not permitted even to know that. We do not know whether they died before the British fleet left, or were sent off when they first escaped; or, indeed, whether they escaped at all. A portion of the claims embraced in this bill have before been before the Committee of Claims and been rejected; and inasmuch as it involves the construction of treaties, I now move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the instructions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the instructions, as follows:

That said committee inquire, and when they make their report, they report—

1. Whether the treaty with Great Britain of February 12, 1822, for carrying into effect the Russian award for payment for slaves that had been carried away by the British fleet, did not expressly define the compensation to be for those contained in a "definitive list" to be furnished by the Secretary of State, and whether the finding of the commissioners in said treaty provided, was not to be "final and conclusive" as to the number, as well as value and ownership of the slaves alleged to have so absconded.
2. Whether the convention of November 13, 1826, held to obviate the difficulties growing out of the said treaty of 1822, in providing for the payment by Great Britain of $1,204,960, as full compensation, did not expressly provide, that said sum should be received by the United States for the use of the persons entitled to it by virtue of the award and said treaty, and did not also expressly keep in force so much of said treaty as confines the compensation to those embraced in the definitive list of losses which had already been furnished.
3. Whether the act of March 2, 1827, for carrying into effect this last convention, did not also recognize the obligations of the "provisions of said convention," and especially as pertaining to said "definitive list," adding only such claims as were duly filed with the Secretary of State, and by him "by mistake omitted to be placed on the definitive list," as was his duty to do under the treaty.
4. Whether any one of the slaves named in this bill was contained in said "definitive list," or so added by the Secretary of State, and if not, whether, in the opinion of said committee the payment for these slaves was provided for by said treaty or convention of 1822, by said convention of 1826, or said act of 1827, for carrying it into effect.
5. Whether any part, and what amount, of said sum so paid by Great Britain is still held for the use of those whose slaves were embraced in said definitive list, and who are entitled to it by said treaty; also that they report, as near as can be ascertained, the whole expenses incurred by the United States in prosecuting said claim for absconding slaves so carried away in British vessels, and not paid for out of said sum paid by Great Britain, including all the expenses of negotiating the treaties or conventions concerning the same, and procuring the award, and of the commissions provided for in said treaty and act.
6. Whether there is any satisfactory evidence that the slaves mentioned in said bill, and especially the ten of the thirteen who are represented in the Senate report as having escaped some time during the war of 1812, (the time being apparently unknown,) ever escaped at all to the British fleet, or were seized by the British forces; and if they so escaped, or were taken, whether there is any satisfactory evidence that they were at any time carried away by said fleet; and if so, whether after the treaty of peace, and "in quitting the places and territories of which the treaty of Ghent stipulates the restitution to the United States," and not before.
7. Whether all the claims in said definitive list have been paid and adjusted; whether there are not now being prosecuted against the United States claims for property taken away by the British fleet, contrary to the treaty of Ghent, as interpreted by the Emperor of Russia, which claims are embraced in the list furnished under the treaty of July 13, 1822, and the payment of which is provided for in the convention of November 13, 1826; and whether the appropriation of the said fund to this claim would not be in fraud of said claimants, whose claims are so provided for.

Before the reading was concluded, Mr. BLISS withdrew a portion of the manuscript, and stated that it had been sent up by mistake.

Mr. GARNETT. The cat is out now. The instructions had as well all be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio states that the portion which has not been read was not designed as a part of the instructions.

Mr. GARNETT. I suppose the gentleman has not the right to withdraw any of the instructions which have been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has entire control over the instructions he has offered, and has the right to withdraw them or modify them as he may choose.

Mr. BLISS. If the gentleman wishes to hear them all read, I have no objection whatever.

Mr. CLEMENS. Will it be competent for me to call for a division of the question, so that it shall first be taken upon the motion to refer, and then upon the instructions?

The SPEAKER. A motion to refer with instructions cannot be divided. The gentleman can only accomplish his object by moving to strike out the instructions.

Mr. GARNETT. I shall try to be very brief in what I have to say. I feel bound by my duty to my constituents, some of whom are interested in this bill, to reply to the attack which has just been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Bliss.]

This is not the first time this bill has come before Congress; it has been before committees of the different Houses on several occasions, and has invariably been reported on favorably. At the last session of Congress it was reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I heard of no minority report. It took its place upon the Calendar, but was not reached during the session.

Now it comes from the Senate. It was there reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, adopted by a large majority of the Senate, and sent to this House. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the mistake he has fallen into as to its present condition. After it came from the Senate, and the House had reached it in order on the Speaker's table, the elder gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] interrupted the usual reference, and proposed to debate it. While he held the floor the House adjourned; and the rules then placed it at the bottom of the business on the Speaker's table. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] stated that it was an engrossed bill on its passage; but he was in error. It is not on its passage, and has never been engrossed at all, as it is a Senate bill. If I am wrong in these facts, the Chair will correct me.

Before the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, and his speech upon it, I was willing that the bill should take the usual course, and be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. But after the gentleman's speech and motion, I shall ask that it may be put upon its passage.

Mr. BLISS. I ask if the bill does not stand upon its passage?

Mr. GARNETT. No, sir.

Mr. BLISS. I understood that the bill was on its passage when I moved to commit it to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman is mistaken in the position the bill occupies before the House, as he is in everything else. If it had not been for that species of madness which seems to afflict the gentleman, as well as the elder gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS], whenever the subject of slavery is involved, just as the approach of water does a mad dog, he would have ascertained what were the facts of the case, as well as the position of the bill in the House, before he attempted to make a speech upon it.

Now, sir, I proceed to discuss these facts. What are they? The bill purports to be a dividend out of the trust fund paid by Great Britain into the Treasury of the United States, for slaves carried away by the naval forces of Great Britain during the last war. That is what the bill purports to be. The Senate committee, in a report which I now have before me, stated that the claims were in every case established by the evidence before the committee; that the slaves had been carried away by the British during the war; that they were the property of the claimants; and the values were fixed by arbitration under the treaty with England. I understand that none of these facts were disputed, and if the gentleman will refer to the debates of the Senate, when this bill came before it, he will find that his friends on the Opposition side of the Senate did not dispute them. He will find that the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] was on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that he did not dispute that the slaves in question were the property of the claimants, and were carried away by the British fleet in the last war.

Mr. BLISS. Did I understand the gentleman as saying that the value of these slaves was fixed before those commissioners?

Mr. GARNETT. The slaves were valued at a certain rate, per capita, the rate fixed by the Emperor of Russia, who was the arbitrator under the treaty. The rate was a very moderate one.

A MEMBER. What was it?

Mr. GARNETT. Two hundred and eighty dollars per head; something ridiculously low. Slaves were high at that time.

On what ground can this be objected to? It is proven that they were carried away by the British fleets. England paid for them; why should not the payment go to the owners? Under the treaty Great Britain agreed to make us restitution for slaves and other property taken away in the last war. "Slaves and other private property" are the words of the treaty. The question arose between Great Britain and the United States as to how many slaves were included. Did it include only those who were in American places and territory occupied by Great Britain and restored at the close of the war, or did it include other slaves who ran away to the British, and were carried off from other parts of our country? This question was referred to the Emperor of Russia by the convention of 1818, and he decided that it included all slaves that the British carried off, whether they were in the forts and places restored at the close of the war, or whether they were runaways who took refuge with the British. Under this decision of the Emperor of Russia, Great Britain and the United States entered into a new convention, by which a commission was created to adjudicate the claims, and Great Britain bound herself to abide by the awards of these commissioners, and to pay whatever they should find due according to the construction of the treaty of Ghent, fixed by the Emperor of Russia. The proceedings of this joint board of commissioners were protracted. Finally by way of compromise, Great Britain and the United States entered into a convention, in 1826, which the gentleman has referred to, by which Great Britain agreed to pay a certain gross sum ($1,204,960) to the United States, in lieu of and in full satisfaction of all outstanding claims. The words are these, and I beg the attention of gentlemen to them, because they involve one of the points to which the gentleman referred:

"ART. I. His Majesty, the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, agrees to pay, and the United States of America agrees to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation by virtue of the said decision and convention, the sum of $1,204,960, current money of the United States, in lieu of, and in full and complete satisfaction for, all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain, by any person or persons whatsoever, under the said decision and convention."

The gentleman from Ohio objects at this point that in the original negotiation, and under the original convention, certain lists of slaves had been presented to the British Government, showing the extent of the American claim for indemnity. If the gentleman will refer to the correspondence between Mr. Adams and the British authorities he will find that while Mr. Adams presented certain lists, he always said they were not complete, and the convention itself went on the presumption that there were other claims not presented in former lists, which might yet be presented and proved before the board.

But the gentleman says that you have agreed with Great Britain that she is to be called on to pay only for the slaves in the list presented to her during the negotiation; and that if you pay for those who were not named in that list, you will violate the trust, and expose Great Britain to still further claims.

Mr. BLISS. That is not my argument. The gentleman has stated that the American Minister, or Secretary of State, said that there were other persons who had lost slaves who were not embraced in that list. I say that in view of that fact, it was covenanted and agreed between the United States and Great Britain that the persons embraced in the list, and none others, should be paid. That was agreed to in two treaties; and now I say, not that Great Britain is liable to be called upon for that, but, that if we abuse the trust and misapply the money to pay for persons not embraced in the list, we will be called on hereafter to pay for the balance of the property which was embraced in the list. I suppose the gentleman does not claim that these were in the list at all.

Mr. GARNETT. I have shown, according to the convention of 1826, that the United States abandoned all claims against Great Britain whatever, arising under that treaty, on consideration of receiving a certain gross sum of one million two hundred and four thousand and odd dollars. The settlement, therefore, is complete between the United States and Great Britain; and the United States alone are concerned with the claimants themselves. The treaty said that the distribution of the sum paid by Great Britain to the United States should be made in such manner "as the United States alone shall determine." Thereby Great Britain entirely set aside all definitive lists which may have been before supplied to her. She paid the United States a gross sum in satisfaction of all damages and all claims, and declared that the United States should alone determine in what manner the final adjustment of these claims should be made, and how the money should be distributed.

Mr. BLISS. By reading the next article of the treaty the gentleman will see that it reaffirms what I claim in reference to those lists.

Mr. GARNETT. The next article simply hands over to the United States all documents and papers—

Mr. BLISS. What treaty is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. GARNETT. The treaty of 1826.

Mr. BLISS. I mean that the second article of that treaty reaffirms all that I claim.

Mr. GARNETT. I will read it to the House:

"The object of the said convention being thus fulfilled, that convention is hereby declared to be canceled and annulled, save and except the second article of the same, which has already been carried into execution by the commissioners appointed under the said convention; and save and except so much of the third article of the same as relates to the definitive list of claims, and has already likewise been carried into execution by said commissioners."

That third article is as follows:

"When the average value of slaves shall have been ascertained and fixed, the two commissioners shall constitute a board for the examination of the claims which are to be submitted to them; and they shall notify to the Secretary of State of the United States that they are ready to receive a definitive list of the slaves and other private property for which the citizens of the United States claim indemnification; it being understood, and hereby agreed, that the commission shall not take cognizance of nor receive, and that his Britannic Majesty shall not be required to make compensation for any claims for private property under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, not contained in the said list. And his Britannic Majesty hereby engages to cause to be produced before the commission, as material towards ascertaining facts, all the evidence of which his Majesty's Government may be in possession, by returns from his Majesty's officers, or otherwise, the number of slaves carried away. But the evidence so produced, or its defectiveness, shall not go in bar of any claim or claims which shall be otherwise satisfactorily authenticated."

The last words of this very article clearly admit other evidence of claims besides the definitive list so often referred to; and the saving of this third article in the annulling clause of the convention of 1826 is only of "so much as relates to the definitive list of claims, and has already been carried into execution by the said commissioners;" that is to say, of the awards already made and executed. Consistently with this meaning, the fourth article provides:

"The above sums being taken as a full and final liquidation of all claims whatsoever arising under the said decision and convention, both the final adjustment of those claims, and the distribution of the sums so paid by Great Britain to the United States, shall be made in such manner as the United States alone shall determine; and the Government of Great Britain shall have no further concern or liability therein."

Therefore I say that the definitive list of claims formerly presented to Great Britain had no further application to the question; for its object was to limit the inquiry before the joint commission and to protect Great Britain against new claims.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman says that the last treaty entirely abrogated the definitive list. How can a treaty abrogate a list when in express terms it affirms it?

Mr. GARNETT. The treaty affirms no such thing, except as to the claims in the definitive list already awarded, which award of course it affirms.

Mr. BLISS. That is a matter of construction.

Mr. GARNETT. Look at the object of the treaty, and at the object of the definitive list. Here were claims to an indefinite amount against Great Britain. The Emperor of Russia had decided that she was bound to pay for the slaves carried away, and then the question arose how many slaves were carried away, and from whom? That was a question of fact; a joint commission was established to settle it; and Great Britain of course desired to narrow the range of inquiry, and confine us, as nearly as possible, to the definitive list. But it should be noticed it was not the list presented in the previous negotiations, as the gentleman would have us suppose; it was such definitive list as might be presented to the commissioners after the board was organized. It was merely fixing a limit to the period within which the creditors must appear and present their claims. But when the convention of 1826 gave to Great Britain a receipt in full for a certain gross sum, and provided that no further claims whatever should be brought against her, she had no further interest in any stipulations of this sort. It was immaterial to her how many might be the claimants, or how long should be allowed them to prove their claims. It was, as the treaty says, for the United States, and the United States alone, to say who should be paid, and when and how, and how much. It was a matter of no sort of concern to Great Britain whether we paid one claim or a thousand claims, or whether we paid none at all.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman says that Great Britain has no interest whatever in the disbursement of this fund. He admits that Great Britain paid a certain sum of money to be paid to those embraced in a certain list. I wish him to show to the House how a nation or an individual that provides a fund, and puts it in the hands of trustees, can have no interest whatever in the disposition of that fund?

Mr. GARNETT. If the gentleman cannot understand that, I am afraid it is impossible for me to instruct him. When the gentleman gives me his receipt in full for certain claims which he has on the part of his clients against me, and when I tell him at the same time, and with the knowledge of his clients, for whom he has full powers to act, that in consideration of that receipt in full he may distribute the money amongst his clients as he thinks proper, I have no further interest in what takes place between him and his clients.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman's case is no parallel—

Mr. GARNETT. If the gentleman rises to a question of fact, I am perfectly willing that he should interrupt me, but not for an argument.

Mr. BLISS. Perhaps it is an argument, and I am not willing to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. GARNETT. Say it.

Mr. BLISS. It is simply this: that in the case put, the gentleman supposes that Great Britain paid the money over to us, leaving us at liberty to pay it to whom we pleased; while the fact is, that in paying the money over to us she has limited us expressly; and now we are asked to trample down that limitation.

Mr. GARNETT. That is a question of construction between us. I have read the treaty, in which it is stipulated that the money shall be disbursed in such a manner as the United States shall determine; and the United States subsequently, by act of Congress, did determine how this money should be disbursed. The act of March 2, 1827, established a board of commissioners to hear and adjudicate these claims. It did not confine the commissioners to any definitive list, but to hear and adjudicate claims for slaves, and declared that—

"The said commissioners proceed immediately after their meeting in the city of Washington, with all convenient dispatch, to arrange and docket the several claims, and to consider the evidence which shall have been, or which may be, offered by the respective claimants, allowing such further time for the production of such further evidence as they may require, as they shall think reasonable and just; and they shall thereupon proceed to determine the said claims, and to award distribution of the said fund among the several claimants, according to their respective rights."

Mr. BLISS. If the gentleman will pardon me I desire to call his attention to one section of that statute—the twelfth section—to which I intended to refer when I was on the floor, and which is as follows:

"That all claims which were deposited in the Department of State, and by mistake omitted to be placed on the definitive list delivered to the former commissioners, shall be, and are hereby, required to be added thereto; and the said claimants shall be entitled to the same rights and benefits as if such claims had been placed on the said definitive list, in terms of the third article of the convention concluded at St. Petersburg, on the 12th day of July, 1822."

Showing that none were to be docketed but such as were on the list, and such as were by mistake omitted to be put on the list.

Mr. GARNETT. I am happy that the gentleman has called my attention to that particular section, because it gives the last blow needed to demolish his own argument. He said that we were bound, in good faith to Great Britain, to admit no claim not contained in that definitive list. I answered by showing that the treaty annulled any stipulation between us and Great Britain as to the definitive list, and that the United States alone were to determine upon and adjudicate the claims presented. He tells me I construe the treaty wrongly; and he refers to a cotemporary statute, which statute expressly declares that claims shall be admitted which were not on the definitive list, and of which Great Britain had no notice.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman will remember that this definitive list was to be furnished by the Secretary of State out of the files of claims in his office; and the gentleman will recollect that, in making out that list, certain claims which were at the time on file were, by the fault of our own Secretary of State, omitted.

Mr. GARNETT. Well, is the gentleman's friend, Great Britain, to suffer for the fault of our Secretary of State? The gentleman has represented that our obligations of good faith to Great Britain required that we should pay nothing but what is on the definitive list; and yet after that he tells us that there are other claims on file in the office of the Secretary of State, which were not put on the list; that it was the fault of the Secretary of State that they were not put there; and that, therefore, the claimants ought not to suffer. I grant that, but it destroys his argument that the definitive list was a matter of good faith between us and Great Britain. Surely Great Britain is not to suffer for the laches of our Secretary of State? Surely, if we are bound in good faith to adhere to the definitive list and not to go beyond it, the gentleman has no right to turn round and say that we will admit other claims because our Secretary of State overlooked them, and neglected to put them on the definitive list? Sir, this whole matter rests upon plain provisions of common sense and honesty. Great Britain agreed to pay us a certain sum if we would release her from all these claims and settle them amongst our own citizens. We accepted her offer of $1,204,000, and undertook to settle the claims of our own citizens. When we did that we opened the door. We said: let all who have claims come forward and prove them by just and fair evidence; if the claims are honest and just we will pay them as far as the money goes, and no further. That was the position we took; and what has been the result? The result has been that part of the money still remains in your Treasury. The result has been that $4,112 89 of that trust money remains in our hands, and we are using it; we are enjoying it. Now, Great Britain took these slaves away, and the claimants in this bill suffered from the loss of them. That money is the price of those slaves, paid by Great Britain into your Treasury as the trustee, and you have no more right to it than you have to the money that stands to the account of any member of the House in the Sergeant-at-Arms' office.

Mr. BLISS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I desire to correct him as to a matter of fact. We have just paid $2,000 of that $4,000 for a ship that was on the definitive list.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman has been mistaken about so many facts that I prefer to take the report of the Senate committee as evidence, rather than his statement. But this bill does not propose to pay anything except out of the $4,000. It does not charge the Treasury at all. It acknowledges these claims, and undertakes to pay them out of the trust fund. If there is not a cent of that fund left, then the claimants will not get a cent. If there are only ten dollars left they will get but ten dollars. If there is $4,000 left, they will be paid to that extent, and to that only. The claims amount to $3,750, which is less than the amount of the trust fund remaining in the Treasury on the 5th of January last. If, as the gentleman says, the whole fund is gone in the payment of claims, why, then, this bill does no harm, because, under this bill, the claims are not to be paid except out of the trust fund. I repeat, it does not propose to pay them out of the general Treasury.

Now, what further objections are made to these claims? It is said that they were not presented to the board of commissioners. But here is evidence to show you that the claims are just; that the slaves were carried off by the British, and that they were the property of the claimants. Here is evidence also to show why the claimants did not apply sooner.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if these claimants, supposing the fund to be exhausted, could not come next year and ask us to pay them out of the Treasury?

Mr. GARNETT. That will be a question for the gentleman to settle with his own conscience. I believe he votes for the French spoliation bill. It is a question for him to settle between his conscience and the claimants. But as you have the trust money in the Treasury, paid into it for their benefit and not for yours, you should pay them their own money, and nothing more. That is all they ask of you, and it is sufficient to argue one question at a time. It is proved that the property of these claimants was carried off by the British in the late war. This is not disputed. It has been valued in the mode prescribed in the treaty. They come forward now and ask you to pay them out of the money received into your Treasury for that purpose and that alone, and you cannot set up any subterfuge, any legal technicalities, against these honest claims. You cannot deny them, unless you take the ground which, I believe, the elder gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] does take, that you will not pay out any money from the Treasury, even as trustees, no matter how it came there, if the claim is for slaves. If the gentleman was trustee under a will or deed, and, in the execution of the trust, money from slaves came into his hands, and the parties entitled to the slaves came forward to claim it and demand payment, would the gentleman settle the trust and pay the money, or would he keep it in his pocket for his own use? I should like to know what would be his course in such an event?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will only say that if they were Democrats, I would pay them the full value.

Mr. GARNETT. Very well; here are Democrats. One, at least, of these claimants, is the Democratic Governor of Virginia.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Well, I would pay him his full value.

Mr. GARNETT. I really do not understand the gentleman's answer. I should like a definite answer.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The member from Virginia, in the commencement of his remarks, spoke of hydrophobia manifested by my junior colleague, [Mr. Bliss,] and myself, and other mad dogs. I intended to answer the gentleman in some degree commensurate with that unkind, ungentelemanly, and cowardly remark.

Mr. GARNETT. Sir, I feel that a man who has distinguished himself throughout his whole life by the blackness of his heart and the violence of his sentiments—[loud cries of "Order!"]—a man who has been guilty of treason against his country and against his God—[Renewed cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not indulge in personalities.

A MEMBER. The personalities commenced on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio made a personal reflection which was not in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I withdraw it, sir.

Mr. GARNETT. Sir, the member from Ohio occupies a position, by his age and his infirmities—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio rose in his place and withdrew the offensive remark.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I withdrew the remark, not with any reference to the member from Virginia, but because I believed the House understood that I appreciated the member, and I had no wish to insult the House.

Mr. GARNETT. Sir, I have nothing to retract.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Neither have I, sir.

Mr. GARNETT. The member from Ohio is sheltered by his physical condition, and he has long since placed himself beyond the notice of gentlemen. I was saying, that as I understood the position of the elder member from Ohio, if he were a trustee, and held money derived from the sale of slaves, he would not pay that money to the cestui que trust, but would keep it for his own purposes. This money was paid into your Treasury as a trust fund, to indemnify the owners for the loss of slaves taken by the British Government—paid to satisfy these very claims. The justice of these claims was acknowledged by the great apostle of abolitionism, John Quincy Adams himself. In his letter written to Mr. Monroe on the subject, he says:

"Our object was the restoration of all property, including slaves, which, by the usages of war among civilized nations, ought not to have been taken. All private property on shore was of that description. It was entitled, by the laws of nations, to exemption from capture. Slaves were private property. Lord Liverpool said that he thought they could not be considered precisely under the general denomination of private property: a table or chair, for instance, might be taken and restored without changing its position; but a living and human being was entitled to other considerations. I replied that the treaty had marked no such distinction; the words implicitly recognized slaves as private property in the article alluded to—'slaves or other private property.'"

That is the doctrine of John Quincy Adams. And when, in your negotiations with a foreign Government, on arguments like this, you have received into your Treasury large sums of money as a trust fund, it is for the House to say whether they can honestly or honorably refuse to execute the trust, and pay over the fund to its owners, on the ground that slaves cannot be held as property. Such a position is perfectly consistent for the gentleman from Ohio. He withdrew a part of the instructions he moved to the Committee on the Judiciary, but enough was read to indicate the true motive of his opposition to the bill—that he opposed it because it provided indemnity for slaves. I read the suppressed parts while they were on the Clerk's desk, and found that he puts us upon a par with heathen and pagan nations, and tells us that it is a disgrace to a civilized age that we should pay any claims arising out of the loss of slaves.

Let gentlemen on all sides of the House see where this doctrine will lead us. This is no question of power between the different sections of the Union. It is not a question whether you will suffer slavery to exist in the Territories, or whether you will admit another slave State. It is simply whether slave property—already here, already within one of the States—property recognized as such by the Constitution, and recognized as such by all men in every section of the Union, except a few of the most fanatical Abolitionists—is entitled to protection against foreign enemies and the perils of war? When you go to war with Great Britain, or any other foreign Power, will you place the property of the southern States at the mercy of the enemy, without protection, or will you extend to it the same protection which is afforded to the property of others against the foreign Power? That is the question. The President and Cabinet in 1814 recognized the principle. Mr. Monroe recognized it. John Quincy Adams, the then Secretary of State, acknowledged it when he argued that slaves carried away by the British forces during the war should be placed upon the same footing with other property. The Emperor of Russia, as arbiter, acknowledged the justice of the claim, and Great Britain confessed it by paying the money into the Treasury, to be distributed amongst the claimants, as this Government might think proper. That fund has not yet been exhausted. And now all that these claimants ask is that you will pay them this money, which is not yours, but which is theirs.

I believe the ordinary course would be for this bill to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I should have no objection to that reference now but for the position which this question has assumed. But, sir, I want to see how many men in this House will vote to refuse the protection of the Government to the southern States in time of war; whether, while the property of other portions of the Union is protected with the whole power of the Government, that of the southern States is to be left to the mercy of every foreign foe. Let us know how many men in this House will assume that position; and to test the question, I wish to put the bill on its passage. I call the previous question, and demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. I submit that as the bill makes an appropriation, under the 130th rule it must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rose to the same point of order before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] commenced his speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that inasmuch as the bill makes an appropriation, if objection be made, it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARNETT. I submit that the nature of the appropriation made by the bill is such as to take it out of the general rule. It is really only a designation of the distribution of a particular fund already distributed.

The SPEAKER. The phraseology of the bill is such, in the opinion of the Chair, as very clearly to bring it within the rule. It is "that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the fund heretofore received from Great Britain under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, &c., which is hereby appropriated for that purpose."

Mr. BLISS. I rise to a question of order. Do I understand the Speaker to decide that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, before it has been referred to one of the standing committees of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes no such decision.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Suppose the motion to commit should be voted down, and the previous question should not be sustained: in what position would the bill then be left?

The SPEAKER. On the Speaker's table, in the opinion of the Chair?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he withdraw his instructions, and allow the bill simply to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLISS. I would, cheerfully, but I have taken some pains to refer to all the statutes and treaties relating to the subject, and I think the references would be of service to the committee in facilitating their investigations.

Mr. GARNETT. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution cannot be put on its passage. Inasmuch as it makes an appropriation, the Chair is of opinion that it must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. But it is not to be paid out of the funds in the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The terms of the resolution expressly make an appropriation.

Mr. GARNETT. I move, then, that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must first withdraw his motion for the previous question.

Mr. GARNETT. Very well; I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to occupy five minutes upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLISS. Must not the vote be first taken upon my motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will find, by reference to the rules, that the vote must be first taken on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARNETT. I modify my motion so as to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be placed on the Private Calendar.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 32) to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, was next taken from the Speaker's table; the question being on its engrossment and third reading.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us see what the section is that it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The seventh section is as follows:

"Any person or persons shipping oil of vitriol, unslacked lime, inflammable matches, or gunpowder in a ship or vessel taking cargo for divers persons on freight, without delivering at the time of shipment a note in writing expressing the nature and character of such merchandise to the master, mate, officer, or person in charge of the lading of the ship or vessel, shall forfeit to the United States $1,000. This act shall not apply to the owner or owners of any canal boat, barge, or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever, used in rivers or inland navigation."

Mr. WADE. Mr. Speaker, near one half of the entire domestic tonnage of the United States is engaged in the navigation of the north and northwestern lakes. The merchandise which is transferred coastwise by this shipping amounts annually to more than three hundred and sixty million dollars, or more than the entire value of the foreign merchandise imported into the United States. I am prepared with documentary evidence, if gentlemen wish to see it; and need only to refer them to the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on commerce and navigation, where they will see that what I state is the fact. I do not mean to take up the time of the House on the subject; but will simply ask that the same provisions which are now made for the advancement of commerce on the ocean, may be extended to our northwestern lakes.

Mr. Speaker, the value of the commerce upon these lakes between the United States and Canada alone, is the third in point of value, and the first in the amount of tonnage, carried on with foreign nations. Still the value of merchandise carried between Canada and the States constitutes but a very small portion of the value of the commerce of the lakes. There was a report made here at the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, (House Document No. 316,) from which gentlemen will find that during that and the preceding year, the value of the commerce of the lakes amounted to several millions more than the whole of our foreign commerce. In the year 1813, the fiftieth year of George III., Great Britain passed a law precisely like our act of 1851, in relation to the liabilities of the owners of merchant ships, and that our act of 1851 is almost a literal transcript from the fiftieth of George III. This law was passed by Great Britain in favor of her commerce; and its working was found so beneficial that American ships could not compete with hers without a similar provision. Since the passage of that act in 1851, our entire tonnage has increased about forty-three one hundredths in amount.

Sir, we on the lakes are placed in precisely the same condition that our brethren are on the sea-coasts in reference to competition with British vessels. I have obtained from the library of Congress the provincial statutes of Canada; and yet find no law of this kind enacted there as late as 1836. But we have not the provincial laws of Canada except since 1836, and cannot say whether the fifty of George III. has been adopted there or not; yet our ship-owners believe that such is the fact. I venture to say, that when I broached this matter in this House at the commencement of this session, there were not twenty members who were aware of the existence of our act of Congress of 1851.

But now it seems, for the first time, that gentlemen have waked up to the enormity of this law. Gentlemen think the commercial world must come to an end. Yet, sir, our entire commerce on the sea-board is under this law, and I defy a gentleman to step forward here and say that within his experience since the passage of this act in 1851, one complaint has been urged against it by the owner of ship or cargo. Why, sir, it was passed by decided majorities; an overwhelming majority in the Senate; but the yeas and nays were not called on its passage in the House.

It became a law, and has wrought its beneficent effects on the commerce of the country to the present time; and I now ask whether, in view of its operation, we should not have it extended to the lakes? It is brought here, on the petition of the leading men engaged in commerce, from one extremity of the lakes to the other. That is the reason why it is here. It is not a matter of mine. I appear here in behalf of the shipping interest of the lakes, to ask Congress to extend the same principle to the commerce of those lakes which it extends to the commerce of the ocean. I do not seek, Mr. Speaker, to extend it to any regions where it is not asked for. Gentlemen ask me, why not extend it to the rivers? The reason is because no man dwelling on the rivers has asked us to do so. We have no evidence that they want it; and, therefore, I do not presume to come here and impose on the people interested in the western rivers, an act which they do not ask for. When I took the floor I did not intend to detain the House, and I now ask for the previous question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio for information in regard to the objects which he expects to accomplish by this amendment of the act of 1851. In the explanation he has given to the House he has stated no reasons.

Mr. WADE. I insist on the previous question, but I will first answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am merely asking for my own information and the information of the House. I find on looking at the pending act of which the gentleman from Ohio is the advocate, that it provides that, so much of the seventh section of the act of Congress, passed March 3, 1851, as prohibits the application of the law to inland navigation shall be repealed.

Mr. WADE. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken; it only applies to inland navigation on these lakes.

Mr. CLEMENS. I will read the act and see whether I am mistaken.

Mr. WADE. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman to read the act. I understand what the act contains. I ask the previous question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio whether, after having given me the privilege of the floor, he should now take away that privilege when I am asking for information, not to obstruct the passage of the bill.

Mr. WADE. If the gentleman will put his question so that I can answer him understandingly, I will withdraw the previous question.

Mr. CLEMENS. The pending bill provides that so much of the seventh section of the act of Congress passed 3d March, 1851, as precludes the said act from applying to any owner or owners of any vessel used in inland navigation shall be repealed. On looking at the act of 1851, I find that by the seventh section it is provided that the preceding sections shall not apply to the owner or owners of any canal boat, barge, lighter, or any vessel of any description whatever, employed on the rivers or inland lakes.

The point which I desire to make on the gentleman from Ohio is this: what is the reason for which he desires these provisions of the act of 1851 to apply to those engaged in inland navigation? What particular section of the act of 1851 is it which he desires to have applied to those engaged in inland navigation, and especially what particular hardship, which they now labor under, does he desire to do away with by bringing them under the operation of the act of 1851? Is it for the purpose of relieving them from liabilities as common carriers? for I find, by the first section of the law of 1851, it is provided that ship-owners shall not be liable for damages to goods by fire, except when caused by design or neglect. Is that his object, or is it his object to make apply the second section, which provides that they shall not be liable for valuable goods except when entered upon the bill of lading? Is it either of these objects that he has in view in making these sections apply to inland navigation?

Mr. WADE. If I understand the bill, and I think I do, it proposes to extend the provisions of the act of 1851 to vessels navigating the lakes Champlain, Ontario, Erie, St. Clair, Huron, Michigan, and Superior, and their connecting navigable waters. It brings that act to bear on vessels navigating these lakes, excluding its operation from canal boats, barges, &c., just precisely as in the original act. It is making that law extend to the navigation of these lakes. I now ask the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that motion.

Mr. WADE. I do not withdraw the previous question; and I hope the House will second it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope the House will not second it. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and WADE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be taken.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I desire to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill regulating the right of suffrage in the Territories was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has no right to call for action on the motion now; but the gentleman from Tennessee has a right, under the rules, to have the motion to reconsider entered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to lay the pending bill, in relation to the liabilities of shipowners, on the table; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-eight, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at thirteen minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 11, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. E. KINGSFORD, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bill and joint resolution; and they were signed by the Vice President:

An act (H. R. No. 63) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th June, 1859; and

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill yesterday received from the House of Representatives (No. 300) declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 279) reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, which has been before the Senate now for two sessions. I will state in a few words that this bill is intended to provide some system by which the applications for the confirmation of land claims may come before us in a report from the General Land Office once a year. It is a general bill providing for the examination of these claims in the different States where they exist, and a report on them by a local board to the Land Office here, an examination by the Land Office here, and then one report from that office to Congress. We have now every year some forty or fifty demands for the confirmation of private land claims, and I desire to introduce some system into the mode by which these private land claims are to be disposed of. I trust that there will be no objection to the bill. It is guarded in conformity with the precedents established by previous Congresses. All the acts for the formation of these boards have expired. It was supposed that nearly all these private land claims had been provided for, but they are coming in so fast that it is necessary to have a system by which we shall have a regular report from the Land Office on them.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does the bill fix any limitation of the time for the claims?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is to be in force for five years.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 279) for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, and for other purposes.

The bill provides that any person or persons, and also the legal representatives of persons, who claim lands lying within the States of Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, or Missouri, by virtue of grant, concession, order of survey, permission to settle, or other written evidence of title emanating from any foreign Government, bearing date prior to the cession to the United States of the territory out of which the States named were formed, and during the period when any such Government claimed sovereignty or had the actual possession of the district or territory in which the lands claimed are situated, shall be authorized to make application to commissioners to be constituted for the confirmation of their title to the lands claimed in a manner which the bill prescribes. The commissioners are to consist of the registers and receivers of the several land offices in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas, within their respective land districts, and the recorder of land titles for the city of St. Louis, for the State of Missouri; and they are to hear and decide under such instructions as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in conformity with this act and according to justice and equity, and the principles by this bill to be established, in a summary manner, all matters respecting such claims within their districts, and make report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, thus classifying the cases: first, all claims which in their opinion ought to be confirmed, where the lands claimed have been in possession and cultivation by the private claimants or those under whom they derive title, for a period of at least twenty years preceding the date of filing the claim; second, all such as in their opinion ought to be confirmed where the lands are claimed under written evidence of title, as in the first class, but where there has been no actual possession and cultivation of the land claimed for at least twenty years; number three is to contain all claims which in their opinion ought to be rejected.

When the Commissioner of the General Land Office approves the report of the commissioners in cases embraced in the first class, such approval is to be final, and patents of relinquishment are to be issued in favor of the claimant, if the claim is not for more than one square league. If the Commissioner approves of the cases in the second class, they are to be reported to Congress for its action, together with all such claims in the first class as exceed the quantity of land limited by this bill. The cases in class number three are to be rejected finally when approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. All other cases are to be reported to Congress, in which the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall disapprove of the reports made by the boards of commissioners. Various sections are provided in the bill to carry out these general principles.

Mr. HUNTER. That seems to be a very important bill. It is new to me; and I should like to hear some explanation of it. Does it propose to transfer jurisdiction from the courts to a board?

Mr. BENJAMIN. No, sir. I stated before the Senator came in, that we have now some thirty or forty or fifty bills every session before the Committee on Private Land Claims, because the acts of Congress which provided local boards in the different States have expired. These claims are so numerous that the committee have instructed me to report a general bill under which those boards are reestablished in the different States for the period of five years. Persons claiming confirmation are to present their claims before these boards. They are composed of the registers and receivers of the land offices in the different districts. They examine the claims, and report them to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He examines them again, and reports them to Congress once a year for general action.

It is due, however, to propriety, that I should state to the Senate that there is one clause in this bill in regard to which it may be possible, though I see no objection to it, that other gentlemen may differ. One clause of this bill provides for a final confirmation in certain cases, without reference to Congress. That clause is this: where a party presents himself before the local board, and claims, under written title, land of which he has already been in possession and cultivation for more than twenty years, and the local board determines his title to be a good one, and then upon appeal the Commissioner of the General Land Office determines his title to be a good one, that title, thus accompanied by possession and cultivation for more than twenty years previous to the application, is to be considered a good title in the Land Office, if the claim does not exceed one league square. To that extent, of late, Congress has not gone. If the earlier acts it did go to that extent. I do not suppose that in any case Congress would desire to confiscate as public land the possessions of a farmer, who was in possession and cultivation, and had been so for more than twenty years, when his titles were approved both by the local board and by the Commissioner of the General Land Office here. I think there is no danger in that; whatever; but that can be stricken out of the bill, if gentlemen desire it.

Mr. POLK. I wish to offer an amendment, which I mentioned to the Senator from Louisiana heretofore. It is in the third section, to strike out all after the word "means," in the third line. The words to be stricken out are:

"Nor shall any such claim be received or considered by the commissioners which has been already twice rejected by previous boards."

Mr. BENJAMIN. That amendment was somewhat discussed in our committee; and it was considered best, on the whole, to retain the provision as a proper guard, that where a claim had already been twice rejected, the commissioners should have no further control over it; and if any special case offered peculiar circumstances of hardship, that case could be brought before Congress by itself and considered; but two objections, we considered, ought to suffice to preclude a claimant from going again before a board.

Mr. POLK. My amendment proposes to strike out one of two classes embraced in the proviso to the last clause of the third section. The first class which it excludes, consists of cases where the rejection was for fraud. That is proper. The next, however, is an absolute and unbending exclusion of all cases which have been twice rejected by boards of commissioners. I offer this amendment because there are instances, in the State of Missouri, at least—where I am more familiar with these land titles—where injustice will be done by such a provision. There have been, I may say, at least two boards of commissioners for the settlement of land titles in the State of Missouri; one under the acts of 1805 and 1807, generally known in that State as the old board of commissioners; and that board rejected the large mass of these inchoate titles that were presented for confirmation. Of the vast amount of lands owned in upper Louisiana, at the time of the acquisition of that territory, there were not more than five perfect titles in all upper Louisiana, including both the States of Missouri and Arkansas. The titles were concessions, inchoate titles, and they were perfected by the action of Congress afterwards.

Then there was a subsequent board—the last board I will call it, as it is so known there—created under the acts of 1832 and 1833, and that was for the confirmation of land titles in Missouri. There were a number of cases—I know some—where claims were presented that did not lie inside of the State of Missouri; and the entry by the commissioners is, "rejected for want of jurisdiction." They did not pass on the claims, but still there was a technical rejection. I do not see that any damage could be done by striking out these claims, and leaving them all, where they are not tainted by fraud, to come before the local board for examination. These commissioners report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he has the supervision of the action of the local commissioners. I think it does not open the way for the confirmation of fraudulent claims, but secures the rights of persons that otherwise might be injured; because we well know that, if this bill shall be passed, and certain claims are excluded under it, an individual who may have an honest claim of the excluded class, will have much more difficulty in getting it through Congress than if this bill had never passed, because its exclusion from this bill is a presumption against him. I hope, therefore, that as it does not tend to break down any barrier against fraud at all, the amendment will be adopted, and let these claims come up for investigation, though there has been a previous rejection, if that rejection has not been on any charge of fraud.

Mr. STUART. I do not desire to discuss this matter. Certainly I have not had a full opportunity to examine the bill, though I have heard something in connection with it; but I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri, that those gentlemen for whom he cares stand better than those who go through the process of the bill. If a man has got a case twice rejected, he can come directly to Congress with it, and if he has merits in his case, he can show them. There is a propriety, however, in excluding them. If these cases are tried, as most of them are, on ex parte proof, and rejected, that ought to be sufficient to prevent their being determined again by any local officer.

I wish, however, to suggest to the honorable Senator from Louisiana an amendment, to which I presume he will not object, more of phraseology than anything else. He has a provision somewhere in the bill, which authorizes the reception of evidence taken in former cases, and declares that it shall be regarded as true prima facie. I suggest to him to make it simply receivable—admissible.

Mr. BENJAMIN. These are the words:

"The facts reported as proven by the former board shall be taken as true prima facie; and the evidence offered before such former board, and remaining of record, shall be admitted on the examination of the claims made under the provisions of this act."

The facts reported as proven are to be taken as true in the new examination, prima facie; the evidence remaining of record is to be admitted on the new examination. Those are the words of the bill.

Mr. STUART. I should prefer that even in regard to those facts, they should simply be received without giving any especial weight to them, one way or the other. Let the provision simply be that the facts shall be received.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The facts reported as proved?

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Received how? It is merely stated here that they shall be taken prima facie as true.

Mr. STUART. If the evidence is in existence, that evidence ought to go before the present board for what it is worth. If the evidence is not in existence, then I doubt the propriety of taking any report of facts independent of evidence as proving anything. If they have the evidence, let it be received.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not exactly take the Senator's point. Many of the former boards reported to Congress that the claimant had proved certain facts, but by reason of the absence of proof upon such and such other points, his claim was rejected. This section of the bill will, of course, only apply to cases wherein former boards have reported certain facts as proven, and yet the claim has not been confirmed. In some cases they report certain facts as proven, and then state what the deficiency is which prevents a confirmation. In other cases they state what evidence there is before them, and say they are not satisfied with it. This bill provides that where the evidence remains on record, that evidence shall be admissible. It provides that where the former boards have reported that certain facts were proven, those facts shall be admitted as true prima facie.

Mr. STUART. I understand the Senator, but he will see the point I make. If there is no evidence to sustain that report now in existence, it is the mere opinion of the officer who gave that certificate. Now I do not think it is proper to say that that opinion, unsupported by any existing evidence, shall be taken as prima facie true; but I think we should leave the parties now to the opportunity of using any evidence that they had in the former case, and make that evidence admissible.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would suggest to the Senator that a large class of cases would be very hardly dealt with by his amendment. This section of the bill provides for cases which were before former boards that run back now nearly fifty years. Here, I may observe, en passant, that the State of Louisiana has been retarded in its improvement and settlement by the legislation of the country, in respect to these land titles, to an extent which gentlemen will hardly believe. Large portions of the State, after fifty years of settlement of other portions, are now unsettled in consequence of the condition of the land titles. Some of these people, fifty years ago, perhaps, proved that they were in settlement and cultivation. The witnesses to those facts are dead and gone, but perhaps their written titles were considered insufficient, or there might have been a want of certificate. Now, if a board appointed by the Government of the United States at that time, reported to us that these parties had proven their possession and cultivation, but that their other titles were insufficient, shall they be required, after fifty years, when the witnesses are dead and the memory of those who knew the facts has been effaced, again to prove that they were in possession and cultivation at a particular date? These claims go back over half a century, and the Government has been exceedingly careless in relation to its duties under the treaty of cession.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must interrupt the Senator for a moment. Unless by general consent of the Senate the Chair must call up the special order.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It will take but a few minutes to close this matter. I ask the consent of the Senate to let this bill be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair would remind Senators that the only question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. POLK.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think the Senator from Michigan will do no good to the bill and no justice to the Government by his proposed amendment. I hope the vote will be taken on the amendments. I would rather yield to them than lose the bill.

Mr. POLK. I beg leave, before saying a word in reply to the Senator from Louisiana on the amendment I offered, to remark that I think he is perfectly correct on the point the Senator from Michigan makes. The section makes a distinction between cases of this kind. Where there is evidence of record, that evidence is to be admitted; but where former boards have reported facts without reporting the evidence, the facts reported are to be considered as prima facie true. I hope the Senator from Michigan will not offer the amendment he suggested. I believe that the provision is right as it stands.

I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment I offered. As I stated before, there are cases on which the entry of the last board was "rejected," though, at the same time, they were not rejected on an investigation of the claims on their merits, but rejected because the board had no jurisdiction as they supposed. They did not reject the claims because they ought not to be confirmed, but because they supposed that they, under the act, were not authorized to report them for confirmation.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the honorable Senator from Missouri permit me to suggest to him that instead of his amendment, we insert after the word "rejected" the words "on the merits;" so that it will read "rejected on the merits?"

Mr. POLK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will offer that amendment if the Senator withdraws his.

Mr. POLK. That is acceptable to me, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The amendment is in the thirty-fifth line of the third section, to insert the words "on its merits" after the word "rejected," so as to make the clause read, "nor shall any such claim be received or considered by the commissioners which has been already rejected twice on its merits by previous boards."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is one misprint on the 8th page of the bill, in the eleventh section and twenty-fourth line. The word "proviso" has been printed "power."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That change will be made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is another change. I recollect that the word "disproval" is placed there for "disapproval."

Mr. BENJAMIN. That was corrected by the Secretary. "Disproval" in the fifth section should be "disapproval."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That correction will be made.

Mr. STUART. I am very reluctant to interfere with a bill of this character, coming from another committee; but I certainly see what, to my mind, are serious objections in retaining the language to which I have already called attention. It establishes a new rule of law in respect to these claims. If the claimants were to come to Congress; if they were to institute judicial proceedings in a court of record, there would be no such rule; and it seems to me that in this class of cases, which stand mainly on ex parte proof, offered by the claimant of the title himself, and not subject to investigation or cross-examination to any considerable extent, to say that what some former officer has certified was proven, in respect to which there is now no existing evidence, is establishing a very dangerous species of testimony.

Mr. POLK. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, I will make a suggestion as to some cases which I know to be existing cases, showing the importance of a provision like this. For instance: in Missouri, at one time the recorder of land titles was commissioner for the purpose of reporting certain claims for confirmation by act of Congress, where the meritorious consideration was cultivation and settlement. There are cases where proof was taken in 1817 and 1818, under the act of 1816, and the proof of inhabitation and cultivation was by a living witness. I know a case now, where the witness was one John B. Hardens. I remember it because it was a case in which I was interested as counsel. He was an old man at that time, and has since died, leaving a widow upwards of one hundred years of age. I have known that in one or two instances that widow was able to make proof; but in the particular case to which I allude she knew nothing about it; but the husband did; and he made proof to the satisfaction of this officer, and the officer reported the fact of inhabitation, cultivation, and possession of the land, on the testimony of this old gentleman. He is now dead. It is an utter impossibility in such a case to have the proof made now. It was proof of a fact in pais, dependent on the testimony of a living witness at the time, and that witness was an old man in 1816, and has been long dead and gone. The fact is stated by the officer to have been proved. This bill merely makes a statement of that fact, as proved, prima facie, true. That is all.

Mr. STUART. I can understand that there may be a single case, perhaps half a dozen cases, where it would be very convenient and very just to say that a certain fact, having been carefully and properly ascertained in 1817, should be received as true now. But, sir, I can also conceive of a great many cases where the reception of such sort of testimony would do manifest injustice. You know nothing about who swore to it; you know nothing about the character of the man—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator suggest a case where he thinks, where the former tribunal has reported a fact as proved, it would be wrong to admit it prima facie?

Mr. STUART. I am really surprised at the inquiry of my honorable friend from Louisiana, for he is a lawyer of extensive practice, and has many times seen a fact sworn to that any individual thoroughly acquainted with the person who swore to it would not believe; and yet, being a stranger to the commissioner, he might certify it to be true. You have no safety in allowing the reception of such testimony. Here is an opinion which was given in 1817, or at any other time within fifty years, by a man you do not know, as to what he thinks was proven, under circumstances that you do not know anything about, and you rely on that to establish a fact in law. The effect is to give a claim fifty years old a great deal better chance than one that exists to-day. This is like all other classes of cases; there are two sides to them. It is not everybody that interposes a private land claim who has got a valid one, by any means. A great many of them are invalid and unjust, and ought not to be substantiated; and there are others that ought to be confirmed. I do not know that I should object to this clause of the bill if it was confined to the mere fact of possession, of occupancy without regard to time; but this bill makes it conclusive as to any fact.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Not conclusive.

Mr. STUART. I say conclusive, unless you can rebut it to-day. It is to be taken as prima facie true in regard to any fact that is certified, no matter what the fact is.

Now, sir, I do say that I have never known a law passed after a half century which determined that every certified fact in a case a half century old should be taken as prima facie true, and I am not prepared to agree to such a law to-day. If the evidence was taken, it certainly was the duty of the officers taking it to preserve it. The probability is, that in many cases, in most cases, the evidence is preserved, and the other clause in the bill will give all the advantage that is desired, by making that testimony receivable, although the witnesses may be dead; and even in such a case, it will be seen that it cuts off all chance of cross-examination, all chance of contesting the credibility or the character of the witness. He swore fifty years ago. His very name is forgotten, and he stands to-day a substantial, honest witness, upon the written testimony that he gave. But when you go further, as is provided for in this section, and say that any fact certified to by those officers shall now be taken and held as prima facie a true fact under this law, it is establishing a very dangerous proceeding. I do not know how all the Senators from the States to which the bill applies may regard it, but I confess that I should not want such a proceeding set up in the State I represent, to interfere with land titles. For the reasons I have stated, I move to strike out of the seventh section the words "the facts reported as proven by the former board shall be taken as true prima facie, and."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Michigan had better examine this amendment. One half of the section is gone at once, if these words be stricken out; and the remainder is very little better. I shall propose to amend the amendment by moving to strike out the whole section.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will give way to the Senator's motion if he wants to destroy the evidence of land titles in his State, and strike out the whole section.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not want to destroy the whole bill. On the contrary, I am willing that the Senator's bill shall pass in a modified form; but I do not want it to be enacted so that testimony given heretofore, which subsequent developments may have proved to be unsound and insufficient—and testimony, too, which did not establish the titles of the cases at the times they were adjudicated before—shall be brought forward now, and secure the recognition of such claims. The language of the seventh section is:

"That whenever any claim is presented for confirmation under the provisions of this act, which has heretofore been presented before any board of commissioners under authority of Congress, the facts reported as proven by the former board shall be taken as true prima facie."

This only relates to cases that have been already considered and rejected. Consequently there is a shadow on every case that is here provided for, in the beginning. All facts reported as proven by former boards are to be taken as prima facie true, and therefore they must stand as proven unless counter evidence shall bring them down. I think this is improper. We know that when courts and boards of examination determine upon one point to defeat a claim, they very often refuse to consider other points, and they admit as true matters that would not be established as true satisfactorily if they were coerced to look to them to establish or destroy the validity of a claim. Such being the case, we may find, in regard to these land claims, proof admitted as just and proper to be received, which would not have been received at all if the decision had turned upon the particular points to which the proof admitted to be true related. I do not believe that those who have had to contest these claims, those who have opposed them heretofore and whose rights are perhaps in conflict with them, ought now to be compelled to meet as established prima facie proof, and to overturn by counter evidence allegations which were not established by law before, and which did not secure the confirmation of the claims upon the first trial of the case.

The second portion of the same section goes on to provide:

"And the evidence offered before such former board, and remaining on record, shall be admitted on the examination of the claims made under the provisions of this act."

I do not understand the extent of the meaning of this clause, unless it is that it shall be admitted without exception, and stand as true. If the section said it shall be considered for what it is worth,

I would have no objection. Now, suppose that, under the examination here provided, after having considered this testimony, and given to it such weight as the board may deem it to be justly entitled to, they are compelled to reject the claim in a case such as the Senator from Missouri has stated—a case of evident justice? If such a case should exist then, the parties could come before Congress hereafter as heretofore; and this can be done without embarrassing or endangering the rights of the parties who have to contest these claims. The truth in regard to them is, that they are held by a very few persons indeed; and, as a general rule, they come in conflict with the rights of great numbers of people. I shall vote myself for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan; and if he does not move to strike out the whole section, I shall make that motion.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will move to strike out the whole section. This section will operate principally in favor of the Government; but in some cases, in just claims, in favor of the claimant. This section clearly refers only to cases that have been formerly rejected. The Committee on Private Land Claims thought that, where the officers of the Government had reported that a claim ought to be rejected, and stated certain facts, those facts ought to be taken as true prima facie; at the same time, if they had reported that certain facts had been proven on the part of the claimant, they ought also to be taken; and that where the testimony remained on record, it ought to be admissible testimony, and ought not to be required to be taken over again. But it operates both ways; and if gentlemen are disposed to be fastidious, I perhaps think it is better on the whole for the private claimants to strike out that section.

Mr. POLK. I hope it will not be stricken out. I am satisfied injustice will be done by striking out that section.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let us have a vote. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STUART. That motion being withdrawn, I will make a single suggestion to the Senator from Arkansas. If he will let this clause be stricken out, as I propose, and then say that the evidence shall be "considered," instead of "admitted," he will cover all the ground made in this argument. I think this portion should be stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I agree to that. The VICEPRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I want the yeas and nays on that question. I believe this section will pass claims that ought not to be passed.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Davis, Doollittle, Darkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Sebastian, Simmons, and Stuart—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Cameron, Clay, Colamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Foot, Green, Hale, Hammond, Iverson, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull and Wade—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. We have now refused to strike out the first portion of section seven. Those Senators who will take the pains to read that section will see that we have established a new class of testimony in regard to these adjudications. I wish to ask the Senator from Louisiana to state, for the information of the Senate, the exact description of board that will preside over the adjudication of the De Bastrop grant which lies in Louisiana and Arkansas, jointly?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will tell the Senator that that has been finally determined by the Supreme Court of the United States not to be a good grant.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Has it been disposed of entirely?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir, entirely; by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The description of the board to pass upon the claim is given in the second section of the bill, which provides:

"That the registers and receivers of the several land offices in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas, within their respective land districts, and the recorder of land titles for the city of St. Louis, for the State of Missouri, and their successors in office, shall be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners to hear and decide," &c.

The Senator does not mean that all these officers shall meet to make one court. The register and receiver, I presume, of a land district in which a portion of a claim or all of a claim may exist, are to be a court to decide on these matters. Is not that so?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator is somewhat mistaken. The bill states they shall hear and determine all matters respecting the claims within their districts, but they are not to decide them. It is called a decision, but it is in the nature of a report. It comes to the General Land Office, and from the General Land Office to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It never is conclusive until it gets before Congress?

Mr. BENJAMIN. No, sir. There is but one class of cases that is concluded; and that is, where a man claims less than one square league, and has been cultivating it twenty years. Then, if the lower board and the Commissioner of the General Land Office both confirm it, he gets his patent. That is the only class of cases that do not come to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Does the Senator mean to say that, where the board has reported and decided in favor of a case, and that decision has been confirmed by the General Land Office, the parties get no title at all until Congress passes a further act to that effect?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir; once a year we are to confirm the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office or reject it, instead of having forty or fifty bills.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That will be a considerable relief, unless the step we have taken in making this evidence prima facie and conclusive on the board is to be received also by Congress as conclusive. I withdraw the amendment I offered, because it is of no avail whatever when the first part of the seventh section is retained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The yeas and nays have not been taken on that bill. It was plain there was no use to do so; but I wish it to be understood, and go on record, that I am opposed to the bill.

INTER-OCEANIC COMMUNICATION.

Mr. MALLORY. A resolution of inquiry which I offered yesterday was laid on the table, at the instance of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.] He has withdrawn his objection. It is to call on the Secretary of the Navy for the report of the Atrato expedition. It will embrace, I understand, about six pages of letter sheet, simple writing. I ask that the resolution be taken up now. It will consume no time.

There being no objection, the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. MALLORY, was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish to the Senate the result of the recent exploration under the command of Lieutenant T. A. Craven, of the United States Navy, as to the practicability of inter-oceanic communication from the Gulf of Darien to the Pacific ocean, by the Atrato and Truando rivers.

COMPENSATION OF MESSENGER.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate take up the report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses in relation to the compensation of the first or principal messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. Foor:

Resolved, That the compensation of the first or principal messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, shall be the same as that now received by the messengers of the Senate, commencing with the present fiscal year.

The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported an amendment to the resolution to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert:

That W. H. Rohrer be paid the same compensation as is allowed to the other messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, to wit: $1,050 per annum, to commence with the beginning of the present fiscal year.

Mr. MASON. That resolution was reported by the late Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Evans, who was chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, under circumstances with which I was perfectly familiar, as a sort of obligation to which I myself, among others, considered we were under to this young man, to place him, at a proper time, on a footing with his brother messenger. The salary some years ago was reduced by the select committee, of which I was a member, because he was then a youth. We were under an engagement that it should be done. My venerable friend from South Carolina, who has been called from us, concurred with me that it ought to be done. This report was, I think, about his last official act here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This being a resolution to appropriate money out of the contingent fund, requires the same proceedings as in the case of a bill. It has received its second reading, and is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. BIGLER. Before proceeding with the special order, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the House joint resolution (No. 26) in reference to the arrangement of the public buildings in Philadelphia, for the purpose of committing it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in order that we may ascertain precisely what is desired.

Mr. CAMERON. With the hope that when the subject shall be referred to the Post Office Committee some plan may be adopted which will promote all the interests concerned in Philadelphia, I shall not object to it.

Mr. BIGLER. The committee will report at once.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 207) to prevent the inconvenient accumulation in the Post Office Department of postmasters' quarterly returns. Also, that it had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 86) for the admission of Minnesota into the Union.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 1st instant, the bill for the relief of Duncan Robertson; and, on the 4th instant, the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858; and, on the 5th instant, the following acts:

An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859; and

An act for the relief of Captain James Mac McIntosh, of the United States Navy.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 10) repealing all laws or parts of laws allowing bounties to vessels employed in the bank or other cod fisheries, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. HAMLIN to strike out "1859," and insert "1865."

Mr. HALE. I have not listened very attentively to the speeches that have been made for and against this measure, and therefore I am willing to take upon trust the commendation that was made by some gentleman who spoke yesterday, who said they had been very able on both sides. I have not attended to the discussion, although I feel some interest in the subject, because I have supposed that, so far as the action of the Senate was concerned, it was a foregone conclusion. Nevertheless, as I live in the vicinity of these fishermen, and know something of them, and generally spend a few weeks, more or less, amongst them in the summer time, when I can get away from Washington in season, I want to say a very few words in explanation of the vote which I shall give.

I shall vote against repealing the bounty; and when I say that, I will say that I am opposed to all bounties, in whatever shape they put themselves, and to all special protections to any kind of industry. I want every man to have an open field and a fair fight. I am opposed to the bounty which the Louisiana planters get on their sugar, in the shape of a tariff, and would be glad to get it off; but I do not expect to succeed in that. I do not think, though, that it is obnoxious to the charge of being unjust because New Hampshire cannot raise sugar-cane. We have a legal right to raise it, but the climate there does not exactly agree with that sort of culture. I do not think that this tax, or this bounty, can be justified at all in reference to its operation upon the fishermen. I think there is but one consideration upon which it can be justified; and if that is not potent and powerful enough to save it, let it go; and that is in its relation to training seamen.

I do not believe, sir, that a man is born a sailor, though it is said he is sometimes born a poet. It is very different with a sailor. It takes training. Some men cannot make sailors if you train them ever so much. It has always been considered, I believe, by every nation that has engaged in mercantile pursuits, and has depended upon them for success and prosperity, a desirable end to train and educate seamen, and that has always been the policy of this Government.

Now, sir, I do not blame any man who is a natural, honest Democrat, for hating the Navy. I think he is bound to have an instinctive and hereditary hatred of it, because it was the pet child of the old Federal party, and never was tolerated by the Democracy until it fought itself into favor. When it did fight itself into favor, I think it fought itself into a little too much favor; and since it was taken up by the Democrats, I think they have petted it a good deal more than the Federalists did. But, sir, the Navy was early an eye-sore to the Democracy. Jefferson hated it. He would go as far out of his way to kick a ship as Randolph would a sheep; and his theory was to dispense with all our naval ships, and substitute gun-boats for them. But when the war of 1812 came, the Navy fought itself into favor. It fought the British and it fought the Democracy both. It conquered the enemies of the country by its prowess on the waves, and by that same means fought down the prejudices with which it had been regarded by the Democracy. After that it became fashionable and popular; and always with this feeling has gone along the idea of raising and training a body of seamen.

I claim to be a friend of the Navy, and I always have been a friend of it. I have manifested my friendship by fighting its abuses. I do not suppose any friend of the Navy now, high as it is in favor, will contend that we ought to go into the mad scheme of combating with France, England, or Russia, in building up an enormous navy. I believe the fact is, that at no time in the history of the world have those nations been making such great and gigantic strides in the increase of their naval power as at the present time. The policy of this Government has been different from theirs, and as it has been indicated by several of the Secretaries, in their annual reports, I will read from one or two of them. In the report of the Secretary of the Navy, made on the 5th of December, 1853, he says:

"These considerations invite the United States to look to means, and to set about the gradual increase of a navy. Will it not, then, be advisable to begin, without delay, to provide and lay up the materials for the building and equipping of ships of war, and to proceed in the work by degrees, in proportion as our resources shall render it practicable, without inconvenience, so that a future war with Europe may not find our commerce in the same unfortunate state in which it was found by the present?"

In another report, made from the Navy Department, dated the 30th of November, 1839, the Secretary said:

"I conceive it will be highly advantageous to the service by placing materials for building, repairing, and equipping vessels generally, at the disposal of the Department for all such purposes, at the precise period they are wanted, and before they deteriorate by time and exposure."

In accordance with this policy, we have been laying up materials for building ships in our docks and yards; and we have been careful to preserve forests of live oak, and to take other means, not immediately for building ships, but to provide materials necessary in time of war; and I suppose the same policy dictates the great manufacture of arms, ordnance, &c., in our several arsenals, and laying up the materials ready for a future emergency. Now, sir, it will be idle to lay up materials for building ships unless you can, at the same time, when you have occasion for these ships, have men to man them; and this has been felt, in the history of England, as one of the greatest necessities that that Government has ever experienced—the providing of seamen. To obviate that necessity, they have, almost from the time they first began to have consequence as a naval Power, trampled upon every right of the subject, and every principle of the British constitution, by having a set of armed press-gangs going round, filling up their navy by force, outraging every principle of natural right and every principle of the British constitution. Not only that, sir, but they carried this system to foreign nations; and, in the madness of their power, claimed to be mistress of the seas; entered the vessels of foreign nations, and took out seamen by force. One of the leading causes which led to our last war with Great Britain was their assertion of a right to take men out of our ships on the high seas; but it was one of the necessities which they felt in accomplishing their purpose to make themselves a great naval Power.

The early founders of our institutions saw the necessity of providing men and materials for the Navy; they saw that a press-gang like that of England never would be tolerated in this country, and could not be; that it was inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution and the feelings of the popular mind, and never could be tolerated; and, as a substitute for that, they looked to the fisheries as a nursery and a school where seamen could be educated. Such has been the policy of the men of this country in every period of its history, with the exception of the short time when it was abandoned, from 1807 to 1813, and in the latter year the necessities of the war again compelled them to resort to it, and from that day to this they have never departed from it.

It seems to me a little singular that when this matter is so intimately connected with the naval strength and the naval necessities and requirements of the country, we have not sought for some information from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to it instead of looking entirely to the Secretary of the Treasury. It is said that in the whole history of the Government we have spent about twelve million dollars on these seamen, or in giving these bounties. Why, sir, that is not so much as you spend upon the Navy in a solitary year. In all time there has not been so much expended in these bounties as we now expend in a solitary year for the Navy; and let it be remembered that this is the only school that you have for the education of the common people in any branch or department, by which they may be fitted to discharge their duty to the country in active service. You have a school at West Point, to educate Army officers and their sons; and you have another at Annapolis, to educate naval officers, but this is the only school you have to educate men for sailors. The great objection to this seems to be, I think, the one suggested by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS,] that while they are getting their education, they are doing something by earning a living. If they were brought together in some school and were kept in idleness, and were not guilty of the hard sin of working at perilous and hazardous duty, I apprehend it would not be so objectionable.

I am not going into that, because as I said I am simply giving my reasons for my vote and I do not expect to influence anybody here. The honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] I know, some time ago censured those gentlemen who prepared essays, brought them in here, and read them off. He will do me the justice to say that this essay with which I am now favoring the Senate is not written—not a word of it, and I am saying it to vindicate my own vote. I do not expect to convince anybody here. I have no idea of doing it. But, sir, knowing these men as I do, I must say a word or two in answer to the wholesale charges of fraud that are brought against them. The charges of fraud that are brought against these fishermen generally come from the collectors of the ports, I understand. Well now, sir, I will venture this assertion: you may go to New York and travel down the coast to Passamaquoddy, which is our eastern water, and take the collectors as you find them, from New York to Passamaquoddy bay, and get them together, and then get the captains of these fishing vessels,
